Nixon Personally Will Make Ultimate Decision on Calley

Army Chief 'Surprised' By Uproar

He'll Await All Appeals, Then Step In

By Carroll Kilpatrick... SAN CLEMENTE, Calif., April 4 (AP).—President Nixon announced yesterday that he will personally review and decide the case of 1st Lt. William L. Calley Jr. although he is not legally required to do so.

Gen. Westmoreland admitted that many civilians have been killed in the war, but he put the responsibility on troops "led by inexperienced lieutenants and sergeants."

WASHINGTON, April 4 (NYT).—The Army, defending itself against public outcry against the trial and conviction of 1st Lt. William L. Calley Jr., said Friday that it had "a moral and legal obligation" to prosecute him.

Flood of Criticism

There was an immediate outpouring of criticism against the military court from segments of the public, Congress, and on Thursday Mr. Nixon ordered that Lt. Calley be removed from the stockade at Fort Benning, Ga., and returned to his quarters while his case is under review.

Partly Cloudy or Partly Sunny?

It is always difficult to predict the international weather from speeches made at gatherings such as the Soviet Communist congress—or an American political convention. The speakers are almost always addressing two quite distinct audiences: their own constituency and the world at large. Frequently, different speakers will point their remarks in opposite directions, although presumably representing the same policies. The result is, frequently, that the weather forecaster must hesitate between describing the outlook as partly cloudy or as partly sunny.

This is the case with the 24th congress in Moscow assembled. Mr. Brezhnev opened by even-handedly condemning the United States on most counts, but holding out the prospect of negotiation. Defense Minister Grechko emphasized the condemnation; Foreign Minister Gromyko emphasized the negotiations. The whole could be depicted heraldically by the eagle on the great seal of the United States, with arrows in one claw and olive branches in the other—a fair symbol of a strong state, but little use in charting the immediate future.

On the whole, the Soviet position seems to be that it would be easy to reach an accord on almost anything—on Moscow's terms. But allowing for the distortions inevitable on such occasions as the congress, this is not without hope. It may be possible to come to an agreement with the Soviet Union on a less one-sided basis than the speeches might seem to indicate. It is also more than possible that the less than monolithic structure of the Soviet Communist party contains its own inner struggles, its own military-industrial complex, which does not enjoy being re-tooled for the production of consumer goods, and would prefer to continue the arms race unabated.

Meanwhile, Mr. Gromyko's emphasis on American "zig-zags" in the Berlin discussions could stand a little illumination. It may be that the American delegation to these talks has changed its position; if so, that remains locked within the negotiating chambers. But the Soviet Union has played some games of its own—or at least East Germany has done so.

The old issue of allowing West Berliners to visit relatives across the wall has served somewhat the same purpose for the Communists that prisoners of war have done for the Hanoi government—an emotional question that North Vietnam and East Germany have used in an attempt to extract major concessions. By broadening the visiting problem to take in a whole complex of issues over Berlin, the East Germans apparently attempted to by-pass the four-power negotiations over the divided city.

They failed, and the wall remains intact, families still separated. But the episode casts a curious light on Soviet diplomacy and on Mr. Gromyko's complaint. "If the American side," said the foreign minister, "is really interested in promoting agreement, who then is keeping it from doing so?" Well, the Soviet-East German ploy in Berlin is one answer.

The President and My Lai

No development in the whole tragic history of the Vietnam war has produced a more spontaneous outcry than the conviction of 1st Lt. William L. Calley Jr. The protests have brought into unaccustomed unity such divergent national figures as Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama and Dr. Benjamin Spock, to say nothing of millions of Americans not normally given to public expressions of outrage.

But the mass clamor in no way alters the correctness of the judgment reached by the court-martial after agonizing deliberation. Exonerated of Lt. Calley would have dishonored both the American military tradition and the solemn commitments this country has subscribed to under the Geneva and Hague conventions on the rules of war.

On that basis, President Nixon's decision to intervene in the Calley case, first to order the officer's release from the stockade and Saturday to announce his intention to review the case and to make a final determination on the sentence, represents an unfortunate interference with the processes of military justice.

It would have been perfectly appropriate, if unusual, under established Army practices for the commanding general at Fort Benning to have ordered Lt. Calley released from the stockade and confined to quarters pending review of his conviction on charges of murdering Vietnamese civilians.

Similarly, it would have been quite proper for Mr. Nixon to have reviewed the case and its outcome at the end of all judicial proceedings. This could even have been considered his duty. But the precipitous manner in which Mr. Nixon publicly intervened over the heads of military authorities to make an exception that is not ordinarily granted to prisoners convicted of capital crimes and more especially his public announcement at this stage that he will himself make the final decision creates a prejudicial atmosphere affecting all intermediate steps in the appeals process. He has now, in his capacity as commander in chief identified himself with the intemperate public outcry against the initial court-martial.

With the White House admission that Mr. Nixon has acted in response to "widespread public interest" to provide a "different quality of review," it is all too clear that he owed to intense public pressure, something he has repeatedly declared no responsible leader could ever do when it came to decisions involving the Vietnam conflict.

The President's moves at a time of high political fever undermine confidence in the impartiality of the outcome he will ultimately decree. This appearance of executive partisanship has been reinforced by the ill-considered remarks of Vice-President Agnew in an interview just hours before Lt. Calley's court-martial sentencing to life imprisonment was announced.

In an indirect but unmistakable reference to the Calley trial, Mr. Agnew said: "The point comes out to this: many of the people in America—particularly those of us who served in the service—understand that the rather abnormal fears and the conditions in a military operation are not subject to Monday-morning quarterback judgment by someone sitting comfortably in an office in Washington."

The men who passed judgment on Lt. Calley were not such Monday-morning quarterbacks. Six combat infantry officers, five of them veterans of Vietnam, unanimously found him guilty of murdering at least 22 unarmed civilians at My Lai. They acted after hearing months of testimony and deliberating for 13 days. "To even consider that any American soldier would ever do such a thing is beyond my own comprehension," one of the jurors declared after the verdict. "I wanted to believe it didn't happen, that it was a hoax."

But My Lai did happen. A House Armed Services subcommittee long ago concluded that: "What obviously happened at My Lai was wrong. It was contrary to the Geneva conventions, the rules of engagement, and the MACV directives." The task of the President and other political leaders is not to sit as judge and jury in courts-martial but rather to address themselves forthrightly to the broader issues that the Calley trial have brought into agonizing public focus—the question of responsibility at higher levels for the acts committed at My Lai and elsewhere in Vietnam and the problem of ending a war that continues to inflict misery and death on the peoples of Indochina.

International Opinion

The Calley Verdict

How to delimit the notion of war crime? Are not the men in government accomplices? Are pilots who sweep villages with napalm and defoliants, causing the death or mutilation of many civilians, less "criminal" than Lt. Calley and his men, who killed a hundred villagers or so? Both obey orders: they do not seek to "kill human beings" but to "destroy the enemy." Both received power of life and death from the same men.

An answer to these questions had been given at the Nuremberg trial in 1945. When it chose to condemn for war crimes not only the military but also political leaders, the tribunal and the Allied governments considered that responsibilities could not be dissociated. But, at Nuremberg, the task was more simple. Victors trying the vanquished could afford to disregard Hiroshima, Dresden and Katyn. . . In the Vietnam war, on the contrary, many Americans are convinced that the intervention of their troops was intended only to defend the freedom of a people threatened by a totalitarian system which never shrank from violence.

No war is ever as clear as chivalrous relations tend to make it believed, but the revolutionary war has opened a chapter of history which has so far baffled any intervention of law. To moralize it, much more would be needed than the condemnation of Lt. Calley, whose crime, the inevitable result of an atrocious war, poses America the question of the legitimacy of that combat.

The Ghost of Harry Hopkins

By C. L. Sulzberger

SANTIAGO, Chile.—Harry Hopkins once reputedly said: "We will spend and spend, tax and tax, elect and elect," and whether he actually coined that phrase or not it represented the formula by which the New Deal was consolidated in successive Roosevelt mandates. It is also the formula adopted by Salvador Allende to try and make irreversible the Marxist regime he is now establishing in Chile.

Yesterday was the first test of his version of this old FDR ploy which, incidentally, Allende denies applying here because he doesn't like to acknowledge a Yankee model. His left-wing coalition presented a list of candidates in municipal elections which were a test of the country's mood.

Last September, Allende gained a slim minority lead of 36 percent in a presidential ballot later ratified by Congress. He says that this time he expects between 46 and 50 percent of the municipal vote will go to candidates backing him. This would be an impressive victory—a gain of 10 to 14 percentage points in just six months. But the real probability is that he will do even better and demonstrate that the majority of the population, for one or another reason, endorses his program.

Fearful Rich

These elections represent a kind of plebiscite, and Allende clearly intends to pace the speed of his socialization program according to their outcome. Many of the rich bourgeois, anticipating the results, are selling their possessions and already skipping out.

Following his version of the Hopkins prototype, Allende has done everything to insure victory. He has dunned or threatened the rich while at the same time deferring mortgage and loan payments until after the tally. He has incurred the loyalty of the armed forces and acceptance by a church which contains a large and even extremist left wing. He has cojoned business interests into continuing to work with his administration, hoping events will turn out better than they fear.

He has granted high wages and promises price cuts, more employment, redistribution of wealth and land. Productivity has slowed down, however. The supply of money is two-thirds up from a year ago, and the budget has soared, but Allende pledges to control inflation and stimulate production through mass purchasing.

The momentum of Allende's balbuting revolution is gaining. Not long before departing for Moscow's 24th party congress, Senator Corvalan, the Chilean Communist boss, said: "The situation is certainly not yet irreversible; it is up to us to make it so."

"That was the purpose of yesterday's election," Corvalan adds: "The people have won the government, which is part of the political power. They must consolidate this victory and advance further so that the entire political power and state apparatus should pass into their hands."

These statements are the key to the Chilean revolution. Corvalan's party almost certainly won't be No. 1 in public prominence when this vote is counted; that will probably be the position of Allende's Socialists with their bandwagon hoppers.

The Communists are unlikely to rise above 20 percent from their previous 18 percent. But, unlike the Socialists, they hang on to their voters. After they resumed legality, they had only 9.5 percent of the ballot in 1960 but have risen steadily ever since.

They are a solid working-class party which lost no members over Czechoslovakia, although promptly endorsing Moscow's invasion. They have never had a leadership struggle. They don't contact the Kremlin through the Russian Embassy but by direct pipeline to the Soviet Central Committee. They don't covet power yet and are playing a low-profile game suitable to world realities and Moscow's basic interests.

Hoping for Power

Nevertheless, some day they hope to assume real power here, probably with Allende as a captive symbol. They are already propagandizing among noncommissioned ranks of the army, which is the only reserve force that could unbalance the juggernaut now rolling on, should a sizable portion of the population get restive.

But that is for tomorrow, not today. At present all Marxists are working in uneasy tandem. Raul Castro even agreed in Moscow last year with the Chilean Communists that Cuba would support the Allende coalition although it disliked the idea of nonviolent revolution.

Allende himself, if he obtains a majority, will surely press to the limit for all reforms permitted by the constitution and, if necessary, call for a referendum to reform that charter.

He is a great artist at pressing his luck just short of the bounds that potential opposition will tolerate; so he will be inclined to step up the pace. But his New Deal, unlike that of Roosevelt and Hopkins, is not a reform; it is a thorough-going revolution and it aims to be permanent.

PIERRY RUN, Va.—For a while there it almost looked as if somebody were going to propose giving Lt. William L. Calley Jr. the Congressional Medal of Honor. Not since the firing of Gen. Douglas MacArthur during the Korean war has there been such an outburst of sympathy for an American soldier. So at least Vietnam has produced an officer everybody recognizes—an anti-hero for a war without glory or nobility, and a symbol for a time of moral confusion.

The popular reaction to Calley's conviction is more interesting than Calley himself. No doubt a lot of people simply thought the penalty was too

The Calley Affair

The true explanation of Lt. Calley's regrettable conduct is that it was clearly the result of over-indoctrination. People guilty of such over-indoctrination should not now be allowed to turn around and condemn Lt. Calley because they do not like the results of the over-indoctrination. The whirlwind came only because they sowed it.

In the Spanish Civil War, after his platoon had taken a Republican village, a sergeant massacred all the inhabitants. Condemned to death by court-martial, he was in Seville prison in 1936 awaiting execution when his case was taken up by the chaplain. The latter succeeded in establishing that the villagers in question were notorious Communists and their village a center of guerrilla activity. On the strength of this evidence the sergeant was reprieved.

The real culprits in the Calley affair were the defendant's lawyers. They should have sought to get their client tried by the Vietnamese—North or South. In Saigon, all charges would be dismissed, and Lt. Calley would be paraded as a national hero. In Hanoi, he would also get an acquittal, and probably a job at the radio station denouncing "U.S. war crimes."

As Americans our family is deeply interested in the fate of Lt. Calley and the conclusions to be drawn from his trial. We greatly appreciated reading the editorial "The Limits of Justice," a fine article, which did not go far enough.

The Role of Technique Notes for Negotiators

By Chalmers M. Roberts

WASHINGTON—A great deal of attention is paid to major international efforts to resolve such issues as the Middle East, Berlin, nuclear arms control and chemical and biological warfare, and quite properly. But something also should be said about the techniques of negotiation on such critical problems.

To scan the list in reverse order, the simplest technique is to stake out a firm position and stick to it. At the Geneva Disarmament Conference the United States from the first took the position that a ban on biological weapons must be negotiated before any ban on chemical. The reasons need not be discussed here; the point is simply that by being obdurate the United States left the Soviet Union with the choice of no agreement at all or giving in to the Americans. Last week they chose the latter.

Negotiating an arms control (SALT) agreement is far more complex. The White House has widely touted the theme that it carefully constructed "building blocks" components and a possible agreement, designed to permit a quick shuffle in response to Soviet proposals without having to fight the battle all over again within the American bureaucracy. The idea was admirable but it hasn't worked out all that well.

The Soviets from the beginning of SALT argued that any agreement must cover forward-based U.S. aircraft and when that reasoning ran into American resistance, as Moscow surely knew it would, the Soviets said why not start with an agreement on anti-missile (ABM) systems alone, leaving control of offensive weapons for later.

Pressure on U.S. The Soviet tactic, perhaps in Moscow's book from the beginning, has put the Nixon administration in a bind. Moscow knows there is support both within and without the administration, despite President Nixon's public "no," for an ABM-only agreement, so it is sitting back and waiting to see whether the pressure will force a U.S. change of position.

As to Berlin, both the Soviets and the three Western allies, the United States, Britain and France, knew from the beginning that they held diametrically opposed basic points of view. The American hope was to let each side reserve its fundamental position while trying to negotiate the negotiable, that is, a new set of rules on Western, essentially West German, access to Berlin in exchange for a lowering of Bonn's public profile in West Berlin.

But Berlin became so focal to ratification of the Bonn treaties with Moscow and Warsaw, due to internal German politics, that the publicly stated ante for a Berlin agreement began to escalate. This resulted in a formal Western document that covered not only the possibly negotiable but also the obviously non-negotiable.

Now the Soviets have come up with their own all-inclusive formal paper. It is not impossible to lay aside the non-negotiable but it would have been easier to avoid it if both sides had not formalized their ultimate desires.

As to the Middle East, consider only the latest and thus far abortive American effort. This was Secretary of State William P. Rogers' public call for an international peace force, including American and Soviet troops, "supportive of an agreement" between Egypt and Israel.

Rogers' Formula Rogers argued, not without logic, that "the type of peace-keeping force that might be formulated would play an important part in the attitude of the parties when they look forward to the final agreement" and "to that extent the two are parallel."

But Israel was so negative on such a peace force that Rogers had to go before most of the Senate to counter the earlier appearance before much the same group of Israel's Abba Eban. In short, by publicizing the peace-force idea, presumably in hopes of forcing Israel to move in the negotiations, Rogers was driven back, publicly at least, behind his own proposal.

Last week he was reported to have told Egypt not to believe accounts that he had altered his position.

Furthermore, Israelis concede that they have accounted counter talk of an interim or partial agreement to back away from the Suez Canal and let it be reopened as a tactic to kill off the Rogers proposal.

The negotiating techniques applicable to each of these four issues obviously must differ. Except for success at Geneva, the results remain uncertain. But what is certain is that in diplomacy how you do it often is as important as what you do.

They didn't give it an age... If I've committed a crime, the only crime I've committed is in judgment of my values.

There is the deadly parallel between Calley and the war policy: nothing wrong but our values! It was "no big deal" what happened at My Lai, said Calley. The "body count" was very much in our favor in Laos, said the U.S. military spokesman in Saigon.

"Democracies," said Herbert Butterfield, "sometimes hate to have to think of war; but when they do turn to the idea they have shown more than once in the 20th century that they quickly become headstrong, forgetting the limits of what power can actually achieve. Our great danger is that we might lose our ideals in the process of having to fight for them, or we might allow that process to make us become more and more like the very thing we first set out to destroy."

We have, however, been on this very path in Vietnam for quite a while, and the Calley incident at least indicates that we have been corrupted in the process. Yet, he has at least provoked some thought in the country about the even larger crimes that are being committed in the name of peace and morality.

The elemental and premeditated crime is clearly the continuation of the war itself. Compared even to Calley's brutality, the dead, wounded and homeless have long since outrun any goal that can be accomplished.

It is not the reputation of Calley that is at issue now but the reputation of the nation. His crimes will soon be forgotten, but the crime of "twisting down" the war—at the expense of God knows how many lives—is likely to be remembered to our disgrace for a long time to come.

"Even in time of war," said Butterfield, "when passions can hardly be kept from rising high, all sanity depends on our keeping, deep at the bottom of everything, some remembrance of that humanity which we have in common with our bitterest enemies."

Our Officials Are Injured in Reggio Protest

As Rival Catanzaro Proclaimed Capital

REGGIO CALABRIA, Italy (AP)—Four regional officials were slightly injured when demonstrators attacked and overturned their cars at a ceremony formally declaring the city of Reggio today as the capital of Calabria.

The ceremony, held in the presence of 1,000 demonstrators, many of whom were young men, was disrupted by a riot. The demonstrators, who had gathered in small hordes, as they drove through the city, were working their way down the main street.

Police said, however, that no one was seriously injured and that the demonstrators were dispersed. They did not use force to clear the demonstrators.

Later when the demonstrators reached the city theater for the ceremony, police had to use tear gas and nightsticks to clear a path through about 2,000 hostile youths.

Police said that the demonstrators were not as bad as they seemed. They said that the demonstrators were self-styled "Action Committee" and called for demonstrations to protest the ceremony.

The ceremony, which was held in the city of Reggio, Calabria, formally marked the end of Reggio's long history as the "capital" of Calabria. The city had been proclaimed the capital of Calabria in 1945.

For eight months, the city has been the scene of a series of general strikes accompanied by looting and destruction. More than 100,000 police and military reinforcements were sent to the city.

The city's defiance was broken last February when the government sent in police columns headed by armored personnel carriers.

During the long battle four men died in Reggio, hundreds were arrested and hundreds injured. The riot damage cost the city millions of lire.

Italian Police To Quiz 8 in Alleged Plot

ROME, April 4 (Reuters).—An investigating magistrate tonight questioned eight men to appear for investigations into an alleged rightist plot against the state.

Police did not name the men but said they were thought to be involved in the plot allegedly organized by the far-right National Front.

This movement is led by former Fascist Prince Junio Valerio Borghese—known as the "Black Prince"—who is sought by police throughout Italy. He is charged with forming an association aimed at provoking armed revolt.

Five members of the National Front are in prison facing similar charges.

If convicted of belonging to such an organization, the eight men ordered to appear for questioning tonight would face prison sentences of between two and eight years.

In separate investigations into extreme-right organizations, police have arrested the leader of the "New Order," Clemente Grassano.

Mr. Grassano, 46, is accused of participating in the New Order, the principal symbol and methods of the Fascist party, founded in 1952.

He faces a minimum sentence of three years in prison, and a maximum of ten if found guilty.

Fifteen members of his movement have been ordered to appear for questioning under a law making it illegal to revive the Fascist party in Italy.

If convicted, they face prison terms of up to two years.

Italian Museum Strike Suspended

ROME, April 4 (UPI).—Employees of Italian museums and historical sites Friday suspended a month long strike, just in time for the Easter holiday rush.

The museum workers said they would go back to work tomorrow because Education Minister Riccardo Misasi promised he would try to get them the work and pay improvements they sought.

But they warned their strike was only suspended and would be resumed if promises made to them about a new contract were not put into effect quickly.

SAN CLEMENTE, Calif., April 4 (AP)—Veteran diplomat and correspondent John A. Seali, who aided President John F. Kennedy as a secret intermediary with the Soviet Embassy during the 1962 Cuban missile crisis, is joining President Nixon's staff as a full-time consultant.

Mr. Seali, 52, who since 1961, will act in "closed" fields as a "foreign policy" but is expected to concentrate on efforts to improve administration communications with the public.

BEFORE THE BALLOT—A Chilean soldier standing guard on a Santiago street as polling booths were being prepared for the nationwide municipal elections yesterday.

Chileans Vote in Test for Allende

SANTIAGO, Chile, April 4 (Reuters).—President Salvador Allende's Marxist government today faced its first popular test of strength in nationwide municipal elections that may determine the future pace of socialism in Chile.

After an intensive and sometimes bitter campaign, more than 3.5 million voters were casting ballots for 5,139 candidates contesting 1,633 posts in 280 municipalities. Voting was brisk.

President Allende has called for an endorsement of the policies of his left-wing United Popular Front and he is expected to strengthen his position at the expense of the two main opposition groups—the Christian Democrats and the right-wing National Party.

But political observers doubt that he will receive more than a 50 percent share of the total votes he hopes to obtain to back his more controversial socialist policies.

100,000-Franc Ransom

Boy, 14, Faked Kidnapping To See If Parents Loved Him

PARIS, April 4 (UPI).—Four schoolboys have confessed to police that three of them kidnaped the other with his approval to test whether his parents loved him enough to pay a ransom, police said tonight.

The victim's father, a well-to-do businessman, paid 100,000 francs ransom for the return of his 14-year-old son.

Two of the three young kidnapers immediately spent 9,000 francs of the ransom in nightclubs on the Champs-Élysées. Police did not say whether the "victim," Thierry, shared in the ransom.

"Thierry complained several times of a lack of affection from his parents," said one of the kidnapers, Stéphane, 12, "so we decided all together on this kidnapping. The money was to be eventually returned."

Names Withheld

As the boys are minors, police withheld their names. Police said the case of the fake kidnapping came to light when the father and son went to police headquarters April 3 to report the crime.

The father told how his son was kidnapped April 1 near Parc Monceau when his mother left him alone for a few minutes in the car. He said an anonymous telephone caller warned the family to look for a communication in their mail box. He warned, "If you make a false step, if you warn police, your son will die, we are without pity."

The father left the ransom money in an anteroom of a building in the Left Bank student quarter April 2, and on April 3 his son arrived home by taxi.

"I Lie"

Police said detectives became suspicious when young Thierry gave contradictory statements about how he had been held in a deserted building. At last, police said, the boy confessed, "I lied. I organized my kidnapping with three classmates."

The "victim" spent his time of "confinement" in the basement of Stéphane's home playing a transistor phonograph.

Police said they found nine-tenths of the ransom stuffed behind the heating system in the basement.

Thierry was returned to his parents, but the three "kidnapers" will appear tomorrow in court. Stéphane said he has a letter signed by Thierry taking the entire responsibility for his "kidnapping."

Soviet Writer Ill During Jail Switch

MOSCOW, April 4 (Reuters).—Andrei Amalrik, 32-year-old author of "Will the Soviet Union Survive Until 1984?" was taken seriously ill a month ago with tubercular meningitis while in transit from prison to a labor camp, his friends said yesterday.

They said that according to a letter he sent to his wife, dated March 10, he had been taken to the Novosibirsk prison hospital, where he lay unconscious for ten days.

Mr. Amalrik, who was sentenced last year to three years in a labor colony for "dissemination of falsehoods derogatory to the Soviet state and social system," was being transferred from a jail near Sverdlovsk to the camp after an appeal on his behalf was rejected.

Fairchild Estate

NEW YORK, April 4 (AP).—Sherman M. Fairchild, camera and aircraft maker, left a gross estate estimated at more than $200 million, according to the will filed for probate Friday.

Mr. Fairchild, 74, who died March 28, left a major portion of his estate to charity.

He Can Sleep Through Anything And Prove It—While Swimming

RIO DE JANEIRO, April 4.—Louis Sancha, 55, an English engineer visiting here, says he can sleep through anything. But he has just proved himself.

Mr. Sancha, who came to Brazil to advise a local construction firm, had been staying at a hotel on Rio's Copacabana Beach but had not had a chance to swim there.

When his work completed he was due to fly home, so he rose early on the last day to take a swim in the sea. After swimming a few minutes he felt tired and turned on his back to float—and he fell asleep.

While he slept the current carried him out to sea toward the Island of Palms, several miles off Copacabana.

Two and a half hours later, fishermen in a small boat found his body floating near the island. Not having enough room in their boat they hooked a steel cable to the belt of his swimming trunks and towed him back seven miles to a fishing port, where his body was examined by a doctor.

The doctor found faint signs of life and worked to revive him while a launch sped toward an emergency hospital. At 3 p.m.—nine hours after he went for a swim—Louis Sancha revived.

The incident had one good aspect. Mr. Sancha has been told to rest for a few days. This, he said, would give him time to swim off Copacabana Beach.

False Values Of Youth Hit By Pope Paul

He Deplores Much Of Modern Protest

VATICAN CITY, April 4 (UPI).—Pope Paul VI dismissed much of modern youthful protest today as a fashionable phenomenon which can lead to mediocrity, false values and wasteful daydreaming.

But he said in a Palm Sunday sermon addressed to youth that he understands why they rebel.

"You want to show yourselves strong and independent of the surroundings you know, the family and society," the Pope said. "You see their defects, you feel their weight."

But the 73-year-old Pontiff warned that protests run the risk of becoming "mediocre, without real values of their own, insignificant, with false heroics and the stuff of daydreams."

The Pope's remarks came during a sermon delivered in a jammed St. Peter's Basilica before an audience that included the diplomatic corps and about 20 Roman Catholic cardinals.

By tradition, the Pope makes youth the subject of the Palm Sunday sermon. He did not even mention such topics as peace, brotherhood or problems confronting the Catholic Church.

Nor did he mention such topics when he appeared at his studio window to greet thousands of tourists and pilgrims in St. Peter's Square. He merely told the rain-drenched crowd he wished them a happy Easter.

In his sermon, the Pope appealed to modern youth to spurn indifferent or conformist Christian thinking and living and asked them to join him in hailing Christ as a model modern leader.

Peru Takes Over British Company

LIMA, April 4 (UPI).—The government Friday took over the British owned Peruvian Corp., which administers the country's largest railroad network.

A communiqué by the Labor Ministry said the measure was designed to "safeguard the economic interests of the workers in light of the grave economic crisis the company is facing and which endangers the payment of their salaries and social benefits."

Protest at N.Y.C. Rites

NEW YORK, April 4 (AP).—Palm Sunday services at St. Patrick's Cathedral here were disrupted briefly today when a civil rights group confronted an elderly bishop in the rear of the crowded church.

Police seized the protesters' leader, James Williams, program director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and removed him from the cathedral.

"Why is the Church continuing to live a lie," chanted Mr. Williams' followers as he was taken away.

Police said Mr. Williams was charged with disrupting a religious service.

A New Regime In Uganda Buries Old King

KAMPALA, Uganda, April 4 (Reuters).—The last King of Buganda, Sir Frederick Edward Mutesa was laid to rest with his ancestors in the royal tombs at Kasubi near here today with presidential honors and the thunder of funeral drums.

Before the body was placed in a grave lined with white lace in the 50-foot-diameter burial hut, Sir Edward's son, Prince Ronald Mutebi, laid a piece of bark cloth across the coffin in a pavilion outside the tombs' reed enclosure.

Then the young prince, who is being educated in Britain, sat briefly on a traditional chair—both ceremonies signifying that he is the king's heir.

Sir Edward, first president of Uganda, died in exile in London in 1969 after being deposed by Milton Obote, who became president. Mr. Obote was ousted last January in a coup by Gen. Idi Amin, who announced that the body of the king would be brought home for burial.

Leaking Tanker Pulled Off Sand By British Tugs

DOVER, England, April 4 (UPI).—A fleet of tugs freed the stranded Liberian tanker Panther from the treacherous Goodwin Sands tonight after a five-day battle, maritime officials said.

The tanker was still belching oil from a damaged tank. There were fears that the oil would pollute England's south coast beaches.

The successful attempt at tonight's high tide followed failure by ten tugs to budge the 15,800-ton Panther in the morning.

The Panther had plowed onto the sandbank three and a half miles off Dover last Tuesday in heavy fog.

Anthony Grant, under secretary of state for industry, scoffed at speculation that Britain might be in for another pollution disaster like the one caused by the tanker Torrey Canyon in 1967.

Mr. Grant noted the Panther carried far less oil than the Torrey Canyon, which carried 117,000 tons. He said that if the Panther broke in two, it could lose no more than 5,000 tons because its oil was in separate 3,000-ton tanks.

30 Leftists Killed In Disturbances In Madagascar

TANANARIVE, Madagascar, April 4 (Reuters).—Government forces are firmly in control of southern Madagascar following clashes between police and members of an extreme leftist movement, an official communiqué said here today.

The communiqué said 30 people had been killed and six injured in the clashes in the past few days with Monima, the opposition movement, which has since been banned. Police have arrested 179 people, it added.

All the dead and injured were Monima supporters.

The communiqué said several members of the movement had made "desperate efforts" to regroup, but added that no new disturbances had been reported and the rest of Madagascar was calm.

An official statement yesterday gave no indication of the scale of the disturbances but reported that the insurgents were armed only with hunting guns, slings and assegais. The statement said the clashes began during a series of checks and searches carried out by police and gendarmes.

Athens Attack Award

ATHENS, April 4 (UPI).—The Greek government has paid 24,200 drachmas ($2,800) damages awarded by a Greek court to the victims of an Arab terrorist grenade attack against the El Al ticket office in Athens, it was announced today. The attack on Sept. 27, 1969, caused the death of a two-year-old boy and injured eight adults.

Joseph Valachi, 66; Betrayed Cosa Nostra to Senate Panel

EL PASO, Texas, April 4 (AP).—Joseph Valachi, 66, who disclosed the inner workings of the Cosa Nostra, or Mafia, to a Senate investigating subcommittee in a sensational series of televised hearings in 1963, died yesterday at the La Tuna Federal Correctional Institution where he was serving a life sentence for murder, the prison announced.

A prison spokesman said Valachi died of a heart attack.

It was Valachi who brought the term Cosa Nostra into popular usage. During his testimony before the Senate subcommittee, he detailed the setup of the organization and its members, then testified that it was known to insiders not as the Mafia, but as the Cosa Nostra—"our thing."

The late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, then U.S. attorney general, called Valachi's testimony the "biggest intelligence breakthrough yet in combating organized crime and racketeering in the United States."

Price on His Head

Valachi's testimony reportedly led organized crime to put a $100,000 price on his head. He appeared before several secret grand jury hearings closely guarded.

Valachi, who had been a strong-arm man for the crime syndicate for 33 years, was sent to Atlanta Federal Prison in 1959 on a narcotics conviction. In 1962 he killed a fellow prisoner whom he falsely suspected of being assigned by the Cosa Nostra leadership to assassinate him.

Sentenced to life in prison for second-degree murder, Valachi agreed to testify before the Senate subcommittee.

During his testimony, Valachi identified Vito Genovese as top man in the syndicate. He said Genovese sponsored him in the Cosa Nostra and said that when he was in the Atlanta prison he received the "kiss of death" from Genovese, who told him, "One apple gets touched and gets bad, it's got to be taken out."

Asked why he had decided to testify, Valachi said: "The main reason is simply to destroy the Cosa Nostra bosses and leaders... They had been very bad to the soldiers, thinking only of themselves."

The son of an immigrant, Valachi was born in New York City and grew up in the then-Italian neighborhood of East Harlem.

Valachi was initiated into the Cosa Nostra when he was 27. His rank, according to experts on the subject, was like that of a

Alioto, Officials Plead Not Guilty of Bribery

JERUSALEM, April 4 (Reuters).—Dr. Israel Ben-Meir, 60, a leader of the National Religious party, died of a heart attack while attending the convention of the United Labor party here tonight.

SEATTLE, April 4 (Reuters).—San Francisco Mayor Joseph Alioto has pleaded not guilty to federal charges of bribery and conspiracy in a case involving three former Washington state officials.

The three officials also have pleaded not guilty to similar charges in federal court. The charges stem from $2.3 million in fees alleged to have been received by Mr. Alioto in 1960 from Washington state public utilities in anti-trust cases against manufacturers.

Key USIA Posts Getting Staff That Know Reds

WASHINGTON, April 4 (WP).—The United States Information Agency has started to staff its key posts with officials who have served in Communist capitals in an effort to improve its ability to compete with Communist ideology around the world.

Some officials are already being shifted. In the future, the top USIA posts in London, Paris, Bonn, Rome and Tokyo will be filled only by persons who have done at least one tour of duty in a Communist country.

The reasoning behind the shifts is that the United States is competing with only one ideology—Communism. As one USIA source put it, "once a person has served in a Communist country he can better deal with the sometimes left-leaning, occasionally anti-American groups he encounters in major world capitals. He will be able to say, 'I was there, and I know what it's like,' the source said.

Shifts expected to be announced soon include moving the current public affairs officer in Prague, Andrew Falkiewicz, to Moscow, and the present cultural affairs counselor in Moscow, McKinley Russell, to Bonn. Mr. Falkiewicz speaks fluent Russian and Mr. Russell is fluent in German.

You would have to be pretty perverse to make a martini cocktail without Martini vermouth. But when it comes down to the vermouth you use, Martini happens to be the name of the game.

My Lai a Foulup From Start to Finish

How Calley's Defense Lawyers Fumbled

By Warren Rogers

FORT BENNING, Ga.—As the astonishingly vehement reaction to the Calley case continues to reverberate around the United States, the central character relaxes at his bachelor pad, watching it all on a huge color TV set, sipping an occasional beer or bourbon with friends, consulting lawyers, working on his autobiography.

He is really a lost and ruined soul. He had, at 23, found a home in the Army four years ago, as an enlisted man, a company clerk. It was something he could do after a long record of failures. William Laws "Call me Rusty" Calley Jr. saw a chance to become an officer and he took it. Three Presidents saw a chance to keep Communism out of South Vietnam and they took it. These circumstances combined in the little Viet Cong village of My Lai IV on March 16, 1968.

Three years later, 1st Lt. Calley stands convicted of premeditated murder of at least 22 men, women and children and of assault with intent to murder a child at My Lai. As he told it at his four-month court-martial, he was confused, frightened, only following orders.

But the six jurors, all combat officers, chose not to believe him. They sentenced him to life imprisonment. They could have been harsher: they could have voted for death.

'Every Benefit'

"We gave Lt. Calley every benefit of the doubt," one juror said afterward. "We did not enjoy doing what we had to do. But all those people, all those babies..."

It was the conscience of the Army that sat here in judgment of Lt. Calley and of its own system, and it was an uneasy conscience at that. Everybody in the courtroom knew—soon knew as 100 witnesses from 31 states paraded to the stand in the Army's longest, most complex and most controversial trial—that the My Lai operation was a foulup from start to finish.

The guilt undoubtedly goes higher, but the American Division is a convenient starting point. It was no division in the traditional sense, with battle streamers proudly flaring from its colors. It was sandlot, pickup, catch-as-catch-can, a motley arrangement of available units, and a good spot for highranks reaching for a general's star to get in some easy command time.

The 11th Brigade was equally jerry-built, and Lt. Calley's Charley Company went into My Lai ill-trained, poorly instructed and terrified. Witness after witness could not remember who was on his right and who on his left as he moved across the rice paddy toward My Lai—a cardinal sin in the struggle to survive, as any infantryman knows.

The Col. Blimp planning, the Sad-Sack character of the soldiers, the intelligence reports that the dreaded 48th Viet Cong Battalion would be waiting and that all women and children would be gone, the fact that the area was a "free-fire zone" and thus always fair game—all these considerations were weighed by the jurors. But they lost significance when Lt. Calley admitted he fired "six or eight" times at point-blank range at an ageless, sexless "enemy."

Yet, Lt. Calley might have gotten off with a much lighter charge and sentence—best betting around the courtroom was involuntary manslaughter and five years—if he had had a better defense. Time after time, it was apparent the defense did not know where it was going because it had not gotten around to planning.

Last summer, the Army sent a young legal officer, Capt. Brooks Doyle, around the country interviewing prospective defense witnesses. A conscientious young man, just passing through on a two-year draftee hitch, Capt. Doyle came back after three months, sat down and typed out a report as thick as a telephone book.

George W. Latimer, the 70-year-old chief defense counsel, never read it. Nor did the other civilian counsel, Richard Kay.

Maj. Kenneth A. Raby, the intense 35-year-old career officer assigned to Lt. Calley's defense by the Army, spent more than 100 hours summarizing previous testimony by prospective witnesses. This included statements they had made to agents of the Army's Criminal Investigation Division, an inquiry conducted by Lt. Gen. William R. Peers, and a hearing held by a House Armed Services Subcommittee headed by Rep. F. Edward Hebert (D., La.).

Again, Mr. Latimer and Mr. Kay never read the summaries. Instead, they had summaries made of the summaries.

In dividing up the witnesses, it was agreed that Maj. Raby, Mr. Latimer and Mr. Kay would each talk to those assigned them the day or night before putting them on the witness stand. Maj. Raby spent two hours or more with each of his witnesses. About 15 minutes was all it took Mr. Latimer and Mr. Kay. Consequently, it was no surprise when Mr. Latimer and Mr. Kay were surprised by their witnesses' testimony.

Mr. Latimer, a Mormon from Salt Lake City, came to the courtroom with a respected reputation, notably that he had spent 10 years as a judge of the U.S. Court of Military Appeals during his 47-year career. A good-natured, likable man, he seemed often to be out of his depth. At 70, he found the physical strain alone a heavy burden, as he often remarked. After about an hour on his feet in court, his practice was to start looking at the clock on the wall. The military judge, Col. Reid W. Kennedy, more often than not took the hint and mercifully called a recess.

Watching Mr. Latimer at work, losing his place among papers or repeating himself, many in the courtroom recalled the picture of William Jennings Bryan at the Scopes trial. To the wall once too often.

Still, it is a measure of Lt. Calley's judgment that he sought out Mr. Latimer and persuaded him to be his lawyer. Mr. Latimer said he took the case because he saw in Lt. Calley a "friendly boy" faced with the full might of the United States government. But, as the jurors stared out day after day for 13 days, Mr. Latimer was grumbling that each day cost him $250 he could earn back home.

Key's Ambitions

Mr. Kay, a Cleveland lawyer and perennial candidate for some office there, made no bones about why he was here. He but-tressed reporters right and left to talk, not about the trial or his client, but about his political ambitions.

"If you fellows had given Lt. Calley a break and written good things about him, Robert Taft wouldn't be in the Senate today," Mr. Kay told several newsmen. "A good press here would have elected me, and I'd be there."

Maj. Raby became so frustrated, working with Mr. Latimer and Mr. Kay, that he tried to quit several times. But Judge Kennedy would not let him, and he stayed on until the end—the only one to meet Lt. Calley when he was freed on parole Thursday pending review and appeals. Mr. Latimer and Mr. Kay had gone home the day before.

Arrayed against the divided, lackluster defense team were a couple of bright young captains, Aubrey M. Daniel 3d and John Partin. Capt. Daniel was in charge, and, at 29, just two years older than Lt. Calley, he was more than a match for the slow-footed Latimer and company.

Capt. Daniel, blond and handsome, alert and tough, had done his homework. A Virginia blue-blood, he adopted a moralistic, puritanical tone at the outset and clung to it throughout. There is no doubt that his constant repetition of the list of victims—a litany of "women, children, old men... and babies"—burned into the jurors' consciences.

Still, Capt. Daniel's righteousness fell flat in the courtroom on occasion. There was something ironic in the contrast between him and Lt. Calley that came through. Roughly they were the same age and yet they were poles apart.

Here was Capt. Daniel, awfully good at his job and the world at his feet. Later this month, he will leave the Army after two years of staying at home and practicing his trade.

And there was Lt. Calley, held back in grammar school for cheating on an examination, a dropout from junior college, a wanderer in search of himself. Barely able to get out of officers' candidate school, he was dropped by helicopter into mine-infested, sniper-fraught territory where the enemy hated him.

On the "better" campuses around the country, it is fashionable to kick out Reserve Officer Training Corps units as a protest against the war. They don't want to get their hands dirty. Consequently, the flow of good officer material from these sources is stopped, and the Army must hunt elsewhere.

Is it any wonder that there are fewer Daniels and more Calleys in our armed forces now?

Departing Reporter's Perspective

The UN Doesn't Produce Miracles But It's Still World's Face-Saver

By Robert H. Estabrook

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y.

WP.—Four and a half years at the UN ought to endow a correspondent with a little perspective beyond the immediate impression that he has been trapped in a revolving door. Nothing would be easier than to yield to impatience over the hypocrisy, the gooey platitudes and the endless torrent of words. Nevertheless, I leave the UN still believing that it is indispensable—although in a different sense from what I once thought.

The UN is often judged by the wrong criteria, thanks in part to the lingering effects of the "one-world" delusion. It is blamed for not producing miracles, and it receives inadequate credit for its genuine accomplishments.

People who are looking for crisp, clear-cut solutions from the international organization are unlikely to find them. They are not in the nature of a body that must somehow merge the often competing interests, jealousies and pretensions of 127 different member countries. The light-hearted motto I once saw above an editor's desk, "Eschew Obfuscation," would not find much response at the UN. Much of the time the only remedies that are possible are fuzzy solutions.

But the distinctive contribution of the UN in the political sphere is to provide the means and cover for nations to get together when they do want to find diplomatic solutions—and to serve as a combination insulator and safety valve in dangerous situations until negotiation is practicable. The UN is the world's foremost face-saver.

Best Bridge

It also, to mix the metaphor further, is the best available bridge between races, ideologies and stages of economic development. It affords the best coordinating mechanism for efforts to preserve the environment, ranging from pollution abatement to controlled exploitation of the seabed. And, just possibly, it may provide a way for China to be knitted into the family of nations.

The UN is sometimes denigrated for its inability to produce ready remedies for sharp differences between the United States and the Soviet Union—as, for example, over Vietnam. But such criticism is unfair. The UN Charter provides no very satisfactory recourse for disagreements between the superpowers.

Actually, the impotence of the UN over Vietnam stems largely from the fact that neither the Soviet Union nor France has wanted to have the issue discussed in the Security Council. And this in turn has reflected the fact that another interested party, mainland China, is not a participant.

Incidentally, Soviet tactics at the UN are often quite different from what they are in bilateral relations when Moscow is cultivating the appearance of good relations. Here, despite occasional cooperation with the United States on such items as peace-keeping and disarmament, the Russians leave no doubt that the cold war is still on and the United States is public enemy number one.

In the Middle East, the UN did not prevent a war in 1967, and has not produced a settlement now. It is easy to blame the institution and its top officials for the withdrawal of the UN Emergency Force on the eve of the 1967 conflict at the demand of Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser.

What sometimes is not taken adequately into account is the tenuous situation of UNEF in the first place because Israel never permitted the international force to operate on its side of the border. This fact contributed to the debacle when Egyptian forces overran UN positions and India and Yugoslavia announced that they would withdraw their contingents.

Jarring Mission

An extremely dedicated man, Gunnar Jarring, has given several years of what ought to be the golden time of his personal and professional life trying to elicit an agreement between Israel and Egypt. That he has not yet succeeded is hardly news; the relevant question is how much worse the situation might have been but for the catalytic efforts and job-like patience of this 62-year-old Swedish diplomat.

Accomplishments through the UN are often less dramatic than the failures. But when there has been a will to avoid major confrontations, UN machinery has often provided a way, as in the peacekeeping efforts going back to Kashmir. Discussion in the UN has sometimes defused explosive issues, such as the Pueblo case. Arrangements worked out through UN bodies have helped crystallize action to deal with international dangers, such as the hijacking menace.

Some 80 percent of the expenditures through the UN system go for economic and social projects. The UN Development Program presided over by the almost legendary Paul Hoffman is among the most effective hands-on economic efforts. The UN Children's Fund, under another talented American, Henry R. Lousisse, has made an important impact in distressed areas with relatively little money. Other working programs in population control, food, health and disaster relief all attest to UN efforts to strengthen the common bonds of humanity.

Yet undeniably the UN has gone through a bad patch in the last few years. The seeming decline of interest in the United States is a phenomenon repeated in other large countries. At least some of the American disillusionment stems from the disappearance of the so-called automatic majority in the Security Council and General Assembly.

Once the United States pretty much had its way, it retains the veto in the Security Council (and the fact that the United States cast its first veto last year on a bad resolution about Rhodesia seemed to me a good thing because it thereby abandoned a phony claim to superior virtue). But in the Assembly on some issues it has difficulty mustering a "blocking third." Communist China is surely coming in strong whether or not the United States likes it.

Apart from such considerations, however, the 127-member Assembly has sometimes behaved with blatant irresponsibility. There is very little correlation between the oratorical fervor in the Assembly and the distribution of real power in the world. Some of the newer Afro-Asian members, keenly attuned to colonial and racial issues, echo Communist charges about U.S. "imperialism."

Yet when all the criticisms are in, the Assembly does provide an immensely important forum in which aggrieved nations can speak out on issues of apartheid and development. To the extent to which the rich nations are susceptible to quibbles of conscience, the Assembly helps focus on hope rather than mere frustration and despair. Efforts are under way, also, to rationalize the Assembly's procedures.

There is less reason for dissatisfaction with the 15-member Security Council—although because of Soviet interference it has seldom given Israel a fair shake. From sterile confrontations, the Council has turned increasingly to behind-the-scenes efforts to compose differences before it votes. This sometimes results in what appears to be ridiculous, nearly-miraculous resolutions. But sometimes it also prevents open breaks. The addition of Japan and Italy to the Council this year has given it added weight of big-power responsibility.

For whatever reason, the Nixon administration severely aggravated the problem of declining interest in the UN by its low-profile policy which prevailed until early this year. The tendency to use the UN only on tangential matters combined with hypocrisy to encourage public boredom.

Now the new American ambassador, George Bush, is working hard to reverse this pattern on the quite supportable thesis that as the U.S. mission takes on more importance, interest in the UN also increases. Mr. Bush has already won respect. But the long-range success of his efforts will depend precisely upon the degree to which he can keep President Nixon interested—and can demonstrate that he speaks for the President.

Major Decisions

Important reasons that the United States needs to maintain and expand this interest are coalescing during 1971. Not only are major decisions imminent on issues ranging from China to the environment, but Secretary-General U Thant has made clear that he wants to retire at the end of the year. Many principal executives are expected to retire with Mr. Thant.

A key part of the effort to harmonize relationships with China and to reconcile other divided countries, will take place in the UN. Thus the selection of a secretary-general for the next five years will have a strong bearing on the degree of stability the UN is able to maintain during what is bound to be a turbulent period.

Beyond this, the selection of a new secretary-general and his major colleagues offers an opportunity to shake up procedures, infuse new blood, gain control of the burgeoning bureaucracy and perhaps to reinstall the sense of dedication that falls victim to the turpitude of an institution becoming set in its ways. It may be the last practical chance to overhaul the machinery for another decade.

On all of these accounts, an alert active and expanded American interest in the UN is crucial. The United States must be prepared to assert itself or watch its influence diminish by default.

Pakistan—Armed Might Versus Will of a People

By Sydney H. Schanberg

NEW DELHI (NYT).—"All of it is necessary, absolutely necessary," a West Pakistan stevedore lectured some expelled foreign newsmen about the Pakistan Army's offensive to crush the independence movement in East Pakistan. "If this happened in your country, you'd do the same thing. It's all part of the game."

A game? Perhaps. But to foreign newsmen in Dhacca, it looked like a surprise attack with tanks, artillery and heavy machine guns against a virtually unarmed population. It was a population that had been using tactics of non-violence—mostly strikes and other forms of noncooperation—to claim the political parity it had won in last December's elections.

And by this weekend enough credible reports of indiscriminate killings had filtered out to leave little doubt that the army of West Pakistan was under fire, if any, restraints in putting down East Pakistani thoughts of autonomy.

The attack began on the night of March 25, after ten days of political negotiations in which the army and the rest of the West Pakistani power establishment had jelled the East Pakistani nationalists into thinking that their demands for greater self-rule would be granted.

It is clear now that the West Pakistanis—who control the government, the army and the economy—never meant the talks to succeed, that they dragged them out only to buy time to get enough troop reinforcements over from West Pakistan to launch the attack.

Signs Were There

But while the talks were going on, nearly every observer—from newsmen to diplomats—resisted the ugly thought that this might be true. The signs were all there —troops coming in by air and sea, the sacking of a martial-law administrator who was too soft and the uncharacteristic silence of the army while the East Pakistanis went about boycotting the military regime and following instead the directives of their leader, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman.

The newsmen reported these signs, but when talk of "some progress" came out of the negotiations, they grasped upon that, because it was something sane—it was what should happen.

They were wrong. Instead, the military mind prevailed, and compromise is not something dwelled upon in the world's war colleges. Force is.

But in turning to force, they apparently misjudged both its limitations and the depth of feeling of 75 million East Pakistanis.

"They thought that a few bullets would scare the people off," said Ranjit Gupta, the police commissioner in Calcutta, just across the border in India. "It is silly—it shows you how little the West Pakistanis know about East Pakistanis."

Instead of the first shooting spree terrorizing the population into submission, it now seems apparent that, while the army may be able initially to establish a hold on the cities and major towns, it will face widespread guerrilla activity in the primitive riverine countryside. This could, and eventually probably will, so undermine the supply lines and mobility of the West Pakistani troops that the independence movement will succeed.

But in the process, thousands, and perhaps hundreds of thousands, or even millions of East Pakistanis could be killed.

Yet what other government has raised its voice in even mild criticism, let alone condemnation?

The United States, which supplied the Pakistani military with its basic weapons and training from 1955 to 1965, has refused to release to the press accounts of army killings it has received from its consulate in Dhacca, the East Pakistani capital.

The British have said that they regret the situation, but that they consider it an internal matter.

The Soviet Union has also remained officially quiet, although segments of the Soviet press have called the army's action "crude arbitrariness and violence."

Communist China, also an arms supplier in recent years who has been wooing Pakistan hard, has said nothing.

U Thant, secretary-general of the United Nations said after several days of uneasy hesitation that he was "very much concerned about the loss of life and human suffering" and would help if the Pakistan government asked him to assist "in humanitarian efforts." Such a request seemed highly unlikely.

Two main points are agreed here, almost without contention: The first is that the chances of East and West Pakistan remaining united appear nil. The second is that in the long run the West Pakistani Army, attempting to impose its government's will on 75 million East Pakistanis, has little chance of success.

U.S. Increases Contacts With Greek Opposition

By Alfred Friendly Jr.

ATHENS (NYT).—U.S. diplomats in Athens, under fire from both Senate investigators in Washington and opponents of the military government here, are shifting their tactics slightly but holding firm to the policy that they and the State Department have formulated.

The policy is rooted in defense considerations, the strategic position of Greece on the southern flank of NATO, the value of Greek ports to ships of the U.S. Sixth Fleet and the need for American communications installations on Greek soil.

Its political result appears often as public support of the government of Premier George Papadopoulos, installed in a swift, bloodless military coup d'état April 21, 1967.

Responsible embassy officials insist that the appearance of support is supplemented by private pressure on the government to honor its pledge to lift martial law and restore parliamentary democracy.

Public criticism of the government's failure to achieve these goals after nearly four years in power, they say, would only inflame tempers, which discreet diplomacy should seek to calm.

Nonetheless, American representatives have recently begun to increase their contacts with leaders of the limited opposition in Greece. Ambassador Henry J. Tasca, who met many of the better-known anti-government spokesmen at a large official cocktail party a few months after he arrived here early last year, has recently invited some of these men to his residence for dinner.

Other officers, many of them even more recent arrivals than the ambassador, have also taken to having lunch with opposition figures, who had felt that, until now, they had been systematically ignored by Americans. The level of contact is still too low to please many.

Panayotis Kanellopoulos, the premier opposed by the coup and still spokesman for the Conservative Radical party, told a visitor recently that although several Western ambassadors call on him almost weekly, Mr. Tasca has not made such overtures.

Updating Ancient History

By Jon Winroth

ROME—Wine has been made in Italy since prehistoric times: grapevines cover the country from the lower slopes of the Alps to the southernmost tip of Sicily. Even the Greeks, whose wines were renowned in the ancient world, referred to Italy as "Oenotria," the Land of Wine.

The Greeks themselves had apparently brought the real science of viticulture—as opposed to simple wine making—with them to their colonies in Italy. The Romans in turn carried it with them to every corner of their vast empire except Britain. They succeeded so well, indeed, that eventually the best wines of Italy came to overshadow the great growths of Greece.

Falerian from Campania to the southeast of Rome became the standard by which all other ancient wines were judged. That Falerian could be aged a century or more gives some indication of how thoroughly the Romans had mastered the science of making wine. They tended their vines and made their wine with as much care as is now taken with a great Burgundy or Bordeaux, and if they lacked the chemical knowledge available today, they knew that heating would help preserve wine and they even had a form of clarification (adding sugar to the fermenting must of a thin wine to bring up its alcoholic content) in which they used honey.

Roman Ways

The Romans raked and fined their wines, that is, clarified them by drawing them off above their lees, and by addition of various substances that caused them to precipitate suspended matter. They put their wines in tightly sealed amphorae and stored them in cool cellars. And before drinking a fine old vintage, they were equally careful to decant it or filter it through gauze.

Unfortunately much of this science was lost after the collapse of the empire, and subsequent history did little to encourage the necessity to improve their generally locally consumed wines.

In the 18th and 19th centuries, when France was developing large export markets—a spur to improvement in quality—Italy had not achieved political unity. Even today only a few Italian wines are truly national, let alone international.

Chianti is obviously one of the great exceptions to this rule. Really fine Chianti Classico is sufficiently well made so that it can live close to a century. Last year a bottle of 1889 Chianti Medini was sold at a public auction in Milan for 340,000 lire ($550). Nor is Chianti the only Italian wine that can reach such a venerable age. Eighty-year-old bottles of Brunello di Montalcino, a Tuscan relative of Chianti, have also appeared on the market and Barolo, a rich red from Piedmont, is perhaps capable of even greater longevity.

Thus it would seem that a return to the great days of Roman wine is well under way, perhaps because the thread was never entirely lost. Falerian is still made although it may not be the great wine of ancient Rome. But Barolo, which was called "a truly great wine" by Julius Caesar, is perhaps a finer wine today than in his time.

Although Italy is smaller than France (301,000 square kilometers as opposed to 551,335), it now produces slightly more wine. Between them, Italy and France produce 40 percent of the world's wine. A full tenth of arable land in Italy is devoted to grapes.

Grapes Everywhere

Grapes grow everywhere, in the neat modern rows of scientific vineyards, on high trellises or bowers, or strung out from tree to tree in orchards, along walls, on terraces, at the edge of fields or simply scattered throughout mixed-culture holdings alternating with squash, corn, or tomatoes.

While this sort of thing is undoubtedly picturesque, it is hardly conducive to serious modern wine making. Many of Italy's vineyards belong to small farmers and are intended basically to satisfy one family's thirst. But as more and more marginal farmers move off the land into the cities, small-scale vineyards are disappearing or being regrouped into larger, more economical units that can be exploited profitably by machine.

For that matter, Italian inventiveness has come up with a mechanical grape harvester that works by suction. Made by Fabbrica di Macchine Agricole Leon di Arsego in Padua, it was first used to bring in part of the 1970 vintage. The harvester comes in various sizes, fully or semi-automatic, and at its best is capable of gathering 1 1/2 tons of grapes an hour on sloping vineyards, the equivalent of 155 man-hours, and up to 2 1/2 tons an hour on flat land, which equals 250 man-hours. It is said that the machine damages neither the vine nor the grapes harvested, so that it may be used even for quality vines.

Of course, this machine, or even tractors for that matter, are useless in vineyards such as those of Amalfi or the Cinqueterre in Liguria, where pocket-sized terraces descend so steeply to the sea that there is no room for roads; the grapes must be taken off by boat.

Unlike France, where only a few grape types are used in each region, Italy has an almost incredible variety to choose from. Within one small province there may be scores of wines—red, white, rosé, sweet, dry, sparkling or frizzante, that is, with a slight fizz—made from dozens of different grape types. And this does not take into account vermouths, aperitifs and special wines.

With all this bounty, there is obviously something to please everyone, Italian and foreigner. But for foreigners the problem lies in the fact that the export market is still underdeveloped. The best of Italy's wines—no doubt to the considerable delight of the Italians—stay home.

Cooking the Italian Way With Italian Wine

By Naomi Barry

FLORENCE—One of the ultimate in subtle refinement is supposed to be cooking with the same wine that you drink at table. Ergo, the preparation of Italian dishes demands the presence of a bottle of Italian wine in the kitchen. The better the table wine, the better the dishes will be.

Eppie Bellini, one of the most famous hosts of Florence as well as one of the city's most celebrated antique dealers, recently did a cookbook incorporating some of his most popular recipes. Many of them require Chianti, Barolo, Marsala.

Veal scaloppine al Marsala had been one of his successes, since student days.

"To make a fast impression on the young ladies who occasionally came to my student apartment, I taught myself to become an expert in preparing veal scaloppine," wrote Bellini.

"Many veal dishes are quick to make, so I did not have to spend too much time in the kitchen. I must admit that my interests were elsewhere. The preparation had been started long before I came. All I had to do was the finishing touches."

VEAL SCALOPPINE AL MARSALA

- One thinly sliced veal scallop per person
- 2 eggs
- 2 cups flour
- 3 tablespoons butter
- 1/4 cup dry Marsala
- 1/2 cup stock or beef consomme
- salt and pepper.

"A good veal scaloppine is just a matter of technique. Soak the scaloppine in beaten eggs for at least one hour. Dredge the meat with flour. Press well with your hand so flour adheres evenly to the meat. Season with salt and pepper.

"Melt butter, using enough to cover the bottom of the pan. Brown the meat, taking pains not to burn. This requires careful watching. After browning five minutes on either side, add the Marsala. Move the scaloppine gently around with a fork. The sauce will become creamy from the amalgam of the butter, flour and wine.

"Have ready the stock or beef consomme in order to lengthen the sauce. Add more, if necessary, until liquid just covers the meat. Cover the pan and simmer for 10 minutes which will make the meat more tender. This dish also seemed to tenderize the hearts of the young ladies who were waiting for me to keep them company."

One of Bellini's most popular dishes, either for a buffet or a set-down dinner, is roast pork Maffioli. The recipe was given him by Giuseppe Maffioli, an actor, a writer, and Italy's prince of gastronomes. The marinade transforms the pork into party fare.

ROAST PORK MAFFIOLI

- 5 pounds loin of pork
- 2 1/2 cups dry white wine
- 2 1/2 cups white wine vinegar
- 3 large onions, sliced
- 1 chopped stalk of celery
- 1/4 teaspoon rosemary
- 1/4 teaspoon thyme
- 1 lemon, cut in slices
- 2 lbs. butter
- 1 tbl. oil
- 1 cup milk.

Make a marinade of the wine—a Verdicchio would be good—vinegar, onions, celery, rosemary, thyme, and lemon slices. Marinate the pork for 24 hours. Line the bottom of a Dutch oven with the onions from the marinade. Add butter and oil. Place meat on the onion base. Set the uncovered casserole in a moderate oven.

A Regional Look at the Varieties

IN its 19 regions (including Sardinia and Sicily), Italy produces an extraordinary variety of wines. The following is an abridged regional guide.

Piedmont, Aosta Valley

This region is, one of the most productive in Italy, usually coming in second or third after Apulia, and at the same time, the one with the highest number of fine wines. The area has been graded more than 20 denominazioni di origine, twice as many as the next highest, the Veneto.

Barolo is the outstanding red wine. Rich in color, aroma, body and character, it is a powerful wine that takes on a brick-red tone with age. It spends three years in the barrel and is apparently capable of living another century in the bottle.

Barbaresco is also a rich, full red made from the same nebbiolo grape as Barolo, but it matures more rapidly and therefore will not age as long. Smoother but less tannic, it lies a little below Barolo on the scale of great wines.

Barbera is another noble grape, much commoner than nebbiolo, and followed by a place name, as in Barbera d'Alba. It can be quite a pleasant wine, although much less robust than Barolo or Barbaresco. Some Barberas are semi-sweet and frizzante (lightly sparkling). The earthiness of a dry Barbera goes well with game and steaks.

Asti Spumante is the great sparkling white wine of Italy, made from the muscat grape. It has an unmistakable and delightfully fruity bouquet. Its sweetness is anything but unpleasant when drunk young and cold, and it makes a fine aperitif wine or a perfect accompaniment to fruit or dessert. It is very light in alcohol content, only about 8 percent.

Vermouth seems first to have been made at Turin in 1788 on a base of the local muscat white wine. Today the output of giants such as Cinzano requires that wines be imported from other regions, notably Apulia, to which are added sugar syrup or mistelle (grape juice fortified with brandy), alcohol and a variety of flavoring agents running from wormwood to juniper, quinine, spices and orange peel, although each company jealously guards its special formula. Vermouth comes white or red, dry or sweet

The Classic from Tuscany: Chianti

By Burton Anderson

FLORENCE—When images of Italy are cast in foreign lands, straw-covered flasks of Chianti are inevitably among them.

The flask, or fiasco, has been native to Tuscany since at least the early 15th century when the art of blowing round-bottomed bottles was supplemented by the craft of weaving straw around them to make them stand up. Tuscans, who have traditionally served their wines copiously, apparently failed to see the promotional value of flasks until a few decades ago when other Italians from as far afield as Brindisi and Ventimiglia began filling them with wine (to use the polite term) and peddling the stuff as far afield as London, Tokyo and New York.

Even that sales gimmick might have been tolerated (after all, nobody had bothered to patent the flask) had the impostors not persisted in calling their various concoctions "Chianti."

That was too much, so the noble, and sometimes not so noble, wine-growers of Tuscany set to do something about it. Their goal has been only partly achieved. If Chianti today is the most widely known name in Italian wine, it also has been the most widely abused.

Imitators

Imitators still exist and, more often than not, they are foreigners who bottle wines similar to the original under such labels as "Vino Tipico di Chianti" or "Tipo Chianti." Such activity is not illegal in Italy. In fact, some deserving growers in adjoining regions are still trying to have their wines recognized as Chianti.

The Italian government has cracked down on the real impostors, especially those who practice what is known here as soffocazione, or filling bottles and flasks with something other than wine. Although some remain in business, for Chianti, at least, the worst appears to be over.

The recent denominazione di origine controllata laws in Italy have given absolute limits to the area of central and southern Tuscany where Chianti can be produced. Within the seven recognized Chianti zones, the organizations of wine growers or consorzio, in cooperation with the state, have set their own high standards. Only those vineyards that meet them can bear the emblem of the consorzio on their bottles.

Chianti Classico is foremost among the zones, both historically and in terms of general quality of its wines. It consists of about 175,000 acres lying between Florence and Siena with Greve at its center.

A hilly area of castles and patrician villas with arched porticos and cypress-lined lanes, vast sweeps of vines and olives ending in oak and pine woods, Chianti Classico is one of those rare places where nature and man's habitat not only complement but enhance each other.

Lamberto Paronetto, in his book "Il Magnifico Chianti," asserts that the grape actually preceded man in the region, citing evidence of fossilized vines from prehistoric times "of the same variety as those cultivated today." He notes that the Etruscans may have been making wine here as early as the 8th century B.C. After banquets they were known to offer it in homage to the gods.

The Romans were not abstemious either, leaving behind various stone goblets, earthen amphorae and sculpture celebrating their favorite beverage. When the Roman Empire declined, so did viticulture. It was not until the 10th or 11th century that new evidence of active cultivation of the grape emerged in Chianti.

Monks led the resurgence. They are credited with spreading vines throughout the area, terracing the steep slopes, and creating the basis for modern winemaking. Paronetto writes that the region might have been called Chianti as early as the 8th century. But a more popular interpretation is that the term evolved several centuries later from the Latin clanger, a trumpet's blare or a bird call, in reference to baronial hunts.

While the city-states of Florence and Siena battled and made up through the Middle Ages, the chateaus of the area got together in 1284 to form the original Chianti League, a guild to set standards and promote and protect their product. The league comprised almost exactly the Chianti Classico zone of today.

Backed by the Medici, coveted by popes, praised by Dante and cultivated by Galileo, Chianti thrived. It had been exported to Holland in barrels in the 12th century and by the 16th it was well known in England. But it wasn't until about 1880 after the glass containers were strengthened to permit cork sealing that the Chianti flask began to appear in the world's wine markets.

The imitators soon followed. By 1924 the producers of Chianti Classico were concerned enough to form a new consorzio to protect their name and redefine their standards. Its symbol for centuries has been a black rooster, the Gallo, which appears today on every bottle on a circular label with the words Consorzio Vini Chianti Classico and a serial number.

Chianti Classico maintains slightly higher standards than the other zones with a lower allowable yield of grapes per acre and a higher minimum alcohol content—12 percent as opposed to 11.5 for the others.

There are those who insist that none but Classico deserves to be called Chianti, but despite the merits of their campaign they have long since lost the battle. The other six zones were recognized as Chianti in 1933 and given the right of denominazione di origine controllata (DOC) in 1987 at the same time as Chianti Classico.

Other Zones

The other six zones are Montalbano, Rufina, Colli Fiorentini, Colli Senesi, Colli Aretini and Colli Pisane. Among them, they produce some 19 million gallons of wine a year compared to about 4 million gallons produced in the original zone. Some of their wines are every bit as good as the fine Classicos.

Three of these zones—Montalbano, Rufina and Colli Fiorentini—combined in 1927 to form the Consorzio del Vino Chianti with its emblem the Furto, a cherub supporting a vine. The zones lie primarily to the north of Chianti Classico and form a wide arc from Pistoia to Dicomano running past the city limits of Florence to the south and east.

Furto, as it is commonly known, is Classico's chief competitor for quality wines and its vineyards have long been the main suppliers of the good table wines served by the flask in Florentine restaurants and trattorias. Some of Chianti's largest and best wine firms—Spalletti, Rufino and Melini among them—are located in the zone.

Before the DOC laws came into effect, the rule of thumb in buying Chianti was to look for the Gallo or Furto emblems on the neck of the bottle. Some buyers still follow the rule, although the words denominazione di origine controllata on any label bearing the name Chianti is a guarantee of genuineness.

Colline Senesi is the largest single Chianti zone. It is split into three parts, one comprising Siena and the hills to the south and west of Classico and the other two centered around the hill towns of Montepulciano and Montalcino.

An Arc

Colline Pisane is a cone lying southeast of Pisa and east of Livorno. The Colline Aretini zone forms an arc around Arezzo.

Five different types of grapes are used to make Chianti. The red San Giorese is the mainstay at 50 to 80 percent, 70 percent being about average; the red canciale nero is added at from 10 to 30 percent and the white trebbiano and mattarsca del Chianti are combined at 10 to 30 percent to tone down the density of the two "black" varieties. Colorino grapes are added in small doses to help give the wine its intense ruby color.

When well made, Chianti can be superb: a sturdy, fragrant wine of exceptional durability with an alcoholic grade of up to 13.5. Perhaps as many as 80 to 100 vineyards, most of them in Classico and Furto, are devoting more and more of their annual crops to quality wines to be put into 70-centimeter Bordeaux-type bottles (not flasks) and sold at was a great year for Sicilian wines.

At least Julius Caesar thought so. The fact is, throughout the celebration of his triumphant return to Rome, the noblest Roman of them all (as history records it) served only delicate red wines from the Sicilian province of Messina.

Hail Caesar!

Today, the world is witnessing the renaissance of this 2,000-year-old Sicilian wine heritage. Better late than never.

Connoisseurs will tell you that the renowned Marsala dessert wines are chiefly responsible for this new awakening. But let it be known that the sun-drenched provinces of Sicily have been producing both red and white still wines of great character and distinction.

For over 2,000 years. However, until recently, fine Sicilian wines have been consumed mostly by local wine lovers. But the export picture is changing in your favor. And with it has come the establishment of rigid quality controls over both wine type and origin.

The "mark of quality" to look for on your next bottle of Sicilian wine is the big "Q"; a designation reserved for those winemakers who have shown a respect for skill and tradition. No sour grapes about it.

Guide to Italian Wines Quality Controls

ROME—One of the major problems which long plagued the Italian wine industry was that few customers know what they were buying and, even when they did, they could not always be sure that the quality of the wine would be on a par with that of the old.

Until 1963 when the government set up a strict nomenclature and inspection system, quality control was left largely to the winegrowers themselves. As in any profession, there were serious, dedicated winegrowers and there were the others.

The 1963 law put the industry on a new footing by regulating production and labeling in the same style and spirit as the French have done with their Appellations d'Origine Contrôlées. The legislation was urgently needed to develop confidence abroad in Italian wines in the wake of falling tariff barriers in the Common Market.

In the first place, the 1963 law went a long way toward clearing up confusion about names. Some wines used to bear the name of the type of grape from which they were made. This was often bewildering in that grape names often resemble place names. (e.g., Barbera, grape name; Barberesco, place name.) Now wines sold in all three government-established categories must carry the place name. Thus, Barbera d'Asti—a red grape (Barbera) wine made at Asti.

Categories

The three categories are: Denominazione di Origine Semplice (DOS), Denominazione di Origine Controllata (DOC) and Denominazione di Origine Controllata e Garantita (DOCG). Wines in all three categories must meet certain fundamental requirements. For instance, a wine bearing the DOS label must come from vineyards within the traditional production zone for that particular type of wine—or from a neighboring area, providing that natural conditions are similar and that the area had been producing that sort of wine a decade before the law went into effect. Wines bearing a given name must have the same physical, chemical and organic characteristics, come from the same grapes and be made by the same methods.

The DOC label is harder to obtain. The wine must come from vineyards tended according to certain methods with a stated maximum yield per acre and be made according to fixed methods. To make sure that the wine meets all requirements, it undergoes rigorous scientific analyses including tests for residual sugar and alcohol content. No wine made from hybrid vines may apply for a DOC. Even the size and shape of containers is regulated. As for the DOCG label, it may not be affixed to any bottle containing more than five liters. The bottle is sealed with a state countersign so that it cannot be opened without breaking the seal. Most important, the DOCG label is reserved for wines of particular reputation and merit.

Wines in the top two categories have labels bearing the name of the wine type and underneath either "Denominazione di Origine Controllata" or "Denominazione di Origine Controllata e Garantita," written out in full. The label also gives the quantity of wine and the name and address of the bottler.

At the same time that the government laid down these labeling ground rules, it established a 28-member National Committee for the Protection of the Denomination of Origin of Wines, composed of representatives of the government, producers from all parts of Italy, experts, dealers, exporters and even consumers. The committee has investigative power. In addition, it acts as a sort of talent scout by seeking out new candidates for the DOC and DOCG categories.

Private Controls

Private controls existed before the government stepped in and they continue to function alongside the official system. Winegrowers in many regions have formed voluntary associations (consorzi) to set standards for their own production. Many consorzi have won the right to DOS, DOC and even DOCG labels and their bottles also bear the consorzi's own, numbered label at the neck of the bottle, yet another guarantee. In Asti, home of the famous sparkling wine, the Consorzio dell'Asti Spumante has 68 members, ranging from small growers to world-renowned giants such as Cinzano, Martini and Rossi, and Gancia.

Parallel to the consorzi are numerous other private organizations dedicated to the defense and promotion of Italian wine. One of these, the Centro per l'Informazione Enologica, under the stewardship of Giancarlo Panarelli, has been particularly active, organizing tastings, parties and publishing a biweekly newsletter, Enopresso. Enopresso has also directly useful advice in the establishment of wine routes. Del vino, marked wine routes to follow in the various wine-growing regions. Map in hand, or simply by following road signs, anyone in a car can see important Italian vineyards and walk off to a given area.

GUIDE TO ITALIAN WINE

Two years as secco or after three years as riserva. There is a growing conviction in Italy that some of these bottles are among the nation's best. In this respect, Chianti is enjoying something of a renaissance among the nation's wine drinkers. It is once again being taken up on wine lists of restaurants.

Prices also reflect the trend. Francesco Chiari, one of Rome's leading wine houses, lists a 1967 Rosso di Montepulciano at $200. The 1968 just over $5 and a 1964 Brutto Barone Rosso at $100. The 1967 Brutto Barone Rosso, which generally enjoys a greater reputation, sells for $200. The 1967 Miraflore and 1968 Brutto Barone Rosso.

Quality

Chianti's re-emergence as a respectable wine is due in no small part to a handful of estate holders, often from noble families, who have continued to make quality wines while others put all their resources into mass production and quick profits.

Bettino Rissotto, owner of Castello del Brolio and president of the Consorzio Vini Chianti Classico, is an example of the businessman-baron. In the early 19th century, an ancestor of the same name was credited with developing the modern formula for making Chianti and with improving the methods of production, aging and bottling the wine.

The present Baron Rissotto's firm is a leading producer of table wines from the surrounding regions (some of it not full-bodied Chianti, by the way). Most of the Chianti Classico produced at his Brolio estate is put into flasks, some of it labeled as to year of production, and much of it exported. His firm also produces several white wines. And as an added sideline he has been endorsing restaurants around Italy, which in turn carry his wines on their menus.

But his special interest is supervising the making of riserva wines. In good years, selected grapes from the best-placed Rissotto vineyards are blended, sampled and tested throughout the fermentation and aging processes, the final product as much a tribute to the winemaker's palate as to the quality of grapes. Castello del Brolio riserva wines consistently fetch some of Chianti's top prices at auctions. But Baron Rissotto is not alone in the quality field.

Other names to seek out, in Chianti Classico, are: Stucchi and the vineyard of Badia di Colibonno; Sannicciatelli and Vignamaggio; Capponi and Calcinai; Antinori and Villa Antinori; Castellbarco and Uzzano; Ginori Conti and Pian d'Albola; Strozzi and Fattoria Paneretta; Mattioli-Fimmedotti and Nozzole; Bendinelli and Fattoria di S. Stefano, and Cappellini and Castello di Verazzano.

In the Petto zone, Frescobaldi and either Nipozzano or Pomino; Guocolardini and Castello Poppi; Pasolini Dall'Onda and the vineyard Capozzano, are a few that stand out.

Their wines are produced in limited quantities and most of them are very hard to find outside the Florence area. They should bear the emblem of the consorzio, either Gallo or Petto, must have the year on them and are bottled. It is wise to buy them within five years of production while they are still bargains at up to $2.50 a bottle—and keep them in a cellar another five to ten years or more, for they age extremely well.

There are a number of other individual growers, as well as large firms and medium and small cooperatives, already established or getting into quality wine production, so the list of fine Chiantis should continue to grow.

There are some very good Chiantis sold in flasks, but as a rule they should be drunk young because that container is not conducive to aging. There is also much very ordinary and some just plain bad Chianti available in flasks.

The DOC laws have given the consumer some protection; although he can be assured of getting a genuine Chianti he cannot always be assured of getting a good one. The consorzio can control what the vineyards do with their wines in the early stages, but they cannot keep track of it all the way to the table. Some growers are careless in making and bottling the wine, some shippers are negligent about moving and storing it, and most wine dealers do not know or care enough about Chianti to learn which are the good and reliable brands.

Chianti has somewhat improved its standing abroad recently, but not as much as its producers would like. To most wine drinkers, it remains a pleasant means for washing down a pizza or a plate of spaghetti and it wouldn't be any fun if it did not come in a flask—this despite the rather tasteless but economically sound trend of recent years to substitute molded plastic holders for straw.

Notwithstanding the popular image, if the resurgent ripples Chianti is creating in Italy are ever to cross the borders, they will be borne across not in flasks, but in bottles.

oven and cook gently for about two hours. Baste alternately with the marinade and the milk.

Pass sauce through a food mill. Pour over the meat or serve separately in a sauce boat. Serves 10 to 12.

A good meat sauce is a must in Italian cuisine. It is needed for many sorts of baked pasta dishes as well as on freshly cooked spaghetti or macaroni. This one calls for red wine—try a Chianti or one of the Sicilian varieties.

BEPPY'S MEAT SAUCE
 1 large onion
 1 stalk celery
 1 carrot
 1 th. parsley
 1 th. basil
 3 slices thick bacon
 1/2 cup olive oil
 1/2 cup red wine
 3 cups peeled tomatoes
 2 th. tomato paste
 4 cups beef consomme
 1 lb. lean pork
 1 1/4 lb. lean beef
 salt, pepper.

Finely chop onion, celery, carrot, parsley, basil. Dice the bacon. Saute gently in olive oil, using large pan. Cut pork and beef into cubes and add. Brown the meat very slowly. Season with salt and pepper. Pour in the wine. Let it evaporate. Stir in the peeled tomatoes cut in chunks and the tomato paste. After a few minutes, pour on the consomme. Cover and simmer gently for three hours.

Lombardy

Valtellina reds are the best and most full-bodied, made, although not exclusively, from the noble nebbiolo grape. The finest growths are Inferno, Sassella and Grumello.

Chiaretto del Garda is the name of a group of light reds and rosés grown along the southern shore of Lake Garda. Served cool, they are pleasant all-purpose wines.

Trentino-Alto Adige

The Trentino is an Italian-speaking region while the Alto Adige (South Tyrol) is mainly German-speaking. Many of the wines have German names, such as Riesling, Gewürztraminer and Blauburgunder (Pinot Noir), and are largely exported to neighboring Germanic countries, while those of Trentino stay put.

Vin Santo is a type of wine also made in other regions, especially Tuscany, Umbria and Marche. It is a rich, sweet, dessert wine made from grapes pressed only when semi-dried after several months of hanging on wires or lying on straw.

Veneto

The Veneto is a great wine-producing region, generally second to Apulia in quantity. It produces some of Italy's best and best-known wines.

Bardolino is one of the very good, light, fresh reds of Italy and is made principally from the corvina grape.

Valpolicella, also from the corvina grape, is probably the best-known wine after Chianti outside Italy. It can go with virtually anything for it is a light red and yet it has smoothness and considerable character.

Valpantena is another good light red made from the same corvina grape that goes into the preceding two wines.

Soave is one of the best-known and finest whites of Italy. It has balance, smoothness and a fresh, flowery bouquet.

Friuli-Venezia Giulia

Many of the wines of this region stem from non-Italian grape types such as borgogna bianco (pinot blanc), Gamay (the grape of Beaujolais), cabernet, sauvignon and riesling, which tend to follow their French counterparts as to type.

Emilia-Romagna

Lambrusco is a dry, fresh red that sparkles and it is a fine all-purpose wine. There are also still reds such as the light Gutturnio and the fuller San Giove. Two good whites are the sweetish Albana and dry Trebbiano, both named for their grapes, as are San Giove and Lambrusco.

Marche

Verdicchio dei Castelli di Jesi is one of the best Italian white wines. Made from the verdicchio grape, it has plenty of taste and body.

Tuscany

This great wine region is, of course, the home of Chianti (see article devoted to Chianti, Page 7) but it is also the home of other great reds.

Brunello di Montalcino, made from the brunello variety of the same San Giove grape that goes into Chianti, is a more full-bodied red than Chianti. It is aged up to six years in the cask and it, too, will keep a century. Another fine Tuscan red is Vin Nobile di Montepulciano.

Umbria

known white wines of Italy. The dry has balance, body and a fine bouquet.

Latium

Castelli Romani, from the Alban hills southeast of Rome, where Romans go for a day's outing among the volcanic lakes, is a fine white-wine area. The best are dry, fragrant wines, such as Frascati.

Apulia

Primitivo, dry and sometimes semi-sweet, is one of the best-

home of a pleasantly light, dry or sweet white with the remarkable name of Est! Est!! Est!!! It seems that a 13th-century wine-loving German bishop, Johann Puggen, was traveling to Rome. He sent a servant on ahead who was to chalk "Est!"—"It is good!"—on the wall of every inn where the wine was good. When the servant got to Montefiascone, he was so taken by the wine that he wrote Est! Est!! Est!!! The bishop never made it to Rome. He drank too much of the wine and died, as his tombstone in Montefiascone testifies.

Campania

This is the home of another famous white, dry flowery Lacrima Christi, made near Naples. Other good, light, dry whites come from the islands of Capri and Ischia. From north of Naples comes Falerno, white and red. Pleasant enough, the modern wines do not come up to the standard of their great ancestor of ancient Rome.

Sardinia

The wines of Sardinia tend to be strong, heavy and high in alcohol. The best-known is Vernaccia, which tastes somewhat like sherry.

Sicily

Mamertino is another great ancient wine that is still produced today as either a dry or sweet heady white of golden color. Marsala is, however, the most famous of Sicily. It is a fortified dessert wine with a rich brown color, made of dry white wine mixed with brandy, sweet wine made from semi-dried grapes and grape-juice syrup.

Apulia

Apulia is the largest wine-producing region in Italy. A great many of the red wines are shipped to other areas to be used in strengthening the local wines. Traditionally, the emphasis has been on quantity rather than quality. Nevertheless, Apulia produces pleasant local wines little known outside the area.

The same is true of the other four Italian regions: Abruzzo, Molise, Calabria and Basilicata. But, with new markets opening up an ever more discerning clientele, there is a definite trend toward making finer wines in all these areas.

Businesses Which Help The Industry

There are certain wine businesses which do more than make money: They help the industry by encouraging the public, foreign and domestic, to learn about the wines of Italy.

Marco Trimani owns one of the largest and best-stocked wine stores in Rome (20 Via. Gallo, 00185 Rome). Every year he publishes a complete list of available wines and their prices. But this is not just a list—it is a catalogue of Italian wines, together with descriptions and history (in Italian) of each wine and region. In the Trimani 71 as the list is called, you can find 1888 and 1891 Brunello di Montalcino at 195,000 and 148,000 lire ($315 and $240) respectively or 50-year-old Chianti Classico at 25,000 lire ($40).

Another commercial organization whose work goes beyond the promotion of its members' produce is the Milan-based firm of Winefood Italiana, which groups a number of important winemaking firms from various regions, such as Chianti Melini, which began making Chianti in 1705. The grouping of several already large firms permits greater improvements in equipment and marketing than any single member could realize.

Exporter

Further, since the group is a major exporter, especially to Switzerland, Germany, Britain and the United States, it contributes to spreading knowledge of Italian wines abroad. Winefood Italiana has set up a tasting center at Lake Garda, due to open this summer, where both vintage and recent wines of all its members will be available for tasting, with company technicians and tasters ready to answer questions.

The wine growers are getting official help from the government in familiarizing the public at home and abroad with Italian wines through the Ministry of Agriculture and the National Institute for Foreign Trade (ICE). ICE publishes statistics, reports and literature about Italian wine in many languages. It also maintains offices all over the world where information about Italian wines is available.

On the Subject Of Comparison

Many people unfamiliar with the wines of a particular country often insist on comparing them to French wines.

There is, however, little point in comparing Italian wines to French because so few conditions are similar. The grape types are usually different, the soil is different, there is far more sun in Italy and the viticulture and vinification are often totally different.

For those who must have comparisons, perhaps the Rhone valley produces wines that most closely resemble Italian wines, for they both tend toward full, even heavy reds and richly aromatic whites, but it is unfair to either

Italy Presses Effort to Improve Quality, Increase Production of Wines

The Honorable
Lorenzo Natali
Minister of Agriculture and Forestry

The protection of "denominations of origin" has been a concern of the legislator in Italy since the beginning of the 20th Century when it was first recognized that effective controls were necessary for the expansion of Italian wines into world markets.

Wine, in fact, is a fundamental part of the country's agricultural economy. Italy, it must be remembered, is considered to have the best natural facilities for the cultivation of vines.

The concepts underlying such controls has undergone considerable evolution throughout the years and the present legislation was not easily formulated. Under the auspices of the Minister of Agriculture, the National Committee for the Protection of the Denominations of Origin of Wines has been supervising the application of this legislation for the last eight years.

It must be acknowledged that it was not a simple matter in Italy to arrive at the formulation of a law that would be able to support quality production. In fact, the principle that the State would intervene only in the case of wines with the oldest traditions was gradually abandoned. Instead, this intervention was expanded to include all productions worthy of recognition for the purpose of defending them from unfair competition. This intervention, which is open to production zones set up relatively recently, even provides for or encourages in areas suited to quality wine cultivation an orientation toward the production of wines of well defined types.

For vine cultivators, in particular, the regulation also means respect for a discipline not only capable of maintaining production on a quality level but also of stimulating a competitive spirit among operators in the same zone. The operators are encouraged to excel through their choice of vines, their techniques of cultivation and their use of effective techniques of wine-making and control.

The formulation of this discipline in our country was also brought about by the need to give support to quality production in the market place and to assure their advantages over unqualified wines.

Thus, Italy's policy of emphasizing the quality and authenticity of its wine production is well known.

The law providing norms for the protection of the denominations of origin of our wines was enacted in 1963. Article 1 establishes that "by denomination of the origin of wines is meant the geographical names and geographical qualifications of the corresponding zones of production—whether or not accompanied by the names of the vines or other indications—used to designate the wines originating in that area and the wine characteristics that are a product of the vines and the natural conditions of that environment."

Another very important norm completes Article 1: the zone of production may also include, aside from the area indicated in the denomination of origin, the nearby terrain if it has similar, natural conditions and, at the date of enactment of the decree, has been producing, for at least ten years, wines sold with the same denomination. This may be done so long as the wines have similar chemico-physical, organoleptic characteristics and are produced with grapes from the traditional vines of the zone. Also the wine must be made by methods generally used in that zone.

Article 2 establishes that the denominations of origin are classified as follows:

- Simple denominations of origin;
- Controlled denomination of origin;
- Controlled and guaranteed denomination of origin.

These different categories of denominations were developed to guarantee the prestige of quality wines by providing a definite base of control. The present legislation therefore establishes the following production criteria for control of the denominations of origin:

- a) The denomination of origin of the wine;
- b) The delimitation of the zone of production of the grapes;
- c) The conditions of production;
- d) The maximum yield of the grapes in must or wine;
- e) The physico-chemical and organoleptic characteristics of the wine, as well as the minimum natural alcoholic strength;
- f) Regulation, conditions and eventual territorial limits.

The production criteria are one of the foundations of the system of controlled denominations of origin. The defense of the interests of the producers of these wines is further assured by the creation of a List of Vines and by the annual production declaration.

This discipline was initiated by a permanent institution, the National Committee, composed essentially of qualified experts and authoritative representatives in this field.

The production of the denomination of origins by now covers more than 100 typical wines, including the most prestigious names in Italian wine production.

But the fact remains that the policy of quality—in the largest sense—requires that Italy must act in two different realms: production and markets.

On the level of production, the more specialized cultivations are replacing the mixed ones. This and improved techniques of cultivation are the basis of greater production.

In this way, old forms of production that no longer respond to the new criteria of consumption are eliminated. In this way, also, production costs are reduced and products are made more easily accessible to the consumers, including those in other countries.

The market, on the other hand, is a most important consideration. It is really the market that determines the product, the conditions of its supply, the conditions of its use. And it is the tastes, habits and customs of the consumer that determine the market's trend. Furthermore, Community regulations, in order to offer the necessary price guarantees, establish precise measures in the internal markets, with the aid of private storage and distillation.

But, above all, it is by virtue of free circulation of the product that the consumer is able to make his choice of quality and price. It is this freedom of choice that will determine the development of Italian wine production. Italian wine producers are facing a vital challenge. For some time now, they have been responding to that challenge.

It is a question of carrying on the effort to improve quality, thereby responding to the tastes of the consumer, who is increasingly harder to please. It is question of continuing the effort to reduce costs, thereby assuring Italy's competitive capability in Community markets. And, finally, it is a question of carrying on the effort, on an associational level, to integrate and extend the existing market network, to give it a more effective organizational consistency.

Market Closes Healthy Quarter With Currency Questions Pending

By Condon Bakstansky
PARIS, April 4.—The first 1971 quarter went off like a lion on the Eurobond market last week with one new dollar issue priced, three dollar financing plans announced...

The situation has its good points. Despite the $125 billion worth of financing done in the first three months of the year, according to Kredietbank Luxembourg figures, prices on the secondary market have shown an overall tendency to firm, which continued last week. Kimberly-Clark's $20 million, 15-year issue was priced ahead of schedule, at par with an 8 1/2 percent coupon...

The big "huh" is how the secondary market, just recovering from the price-depressing early-year rush of new issues, will be hit by the new, unsettling foreign exchange developments. Short-term Eurobonds, as well as non-dollar bonds, have been increasingly in vogue with investors for a couple of months now, as the first flickers of the present problems appeared...

In the money markets, the jitters have been developing since U.S. banks began to heavily unwind their Eurodollar positions following U.S. interest rates reductions. Steady proportions of that cash went into the various

Slow Tide of U.S. Retail Sales, Heavy Going Of Dollar Abroad Leave Market Becalmed

By Thomas E. Mullany

NEW YORK, April (NYT)—The giant economy of the United States was still making halting headway last week as it entered the normally more placid waters of the second quarter, but its progress continued to be disappointingly slowed by the dragging anchor of apathetic consumer spending.

Concern over the basically uninspiring performance of the economy and over the renewed troubles of the dollar in the foreign-exchange markets has contained the interest of the financial world in recent days and overshadowed activity in the securities markets.

For the most part, the stock market is currently becalmed, as investors await more positive indications on the course of business, the direction of interest rates, the trend of inflation and the international status of the dollar.

In their central bank rates by Great Britain and West Germany. The gain in factory orders might have aroused greater interest had it not indicated a tapering of the recent upward trend. Similarly, the 0.6 percent increase in the leading economic indicators for February was substantially less than the 1.3 percent advance reported in January.

When data on such key economic indicators as industrial production, personal income and the gross national product for March and the first quarter are available over the next two weeks, they, too, are likely to follow the economic surge following the end of the General Motors strike last year is losing its steam quickly.

If the economy is to generate the strong upward thrust needed to activate a greater portion of idle plant capacity, now estimated at more than 35 percent, and to reduce the unemployment rate from the 6 percent level, it will need the stimulus of much more vigorous public spending than has been seen so far in 1971.

Only one week remains in the Easter selling season—the second busiest period for apparel at retail establishments each year—and the word from the nation's merchants is that only a moderate upturn has occurred so far.

Total retail sales for the week ended March 27 were reported by the Commerce Department at $7.31 billion, a gain of only 4 percent over the volume achieved in the comparable week of last week. Department-store volume was actually down 2.6 percent, probably because Easter occurred in the year-ago week. But if currently higher prices are subtracted, it is obvious that shoppers are still in a listless mood.

Amex and Over-Counter

By Alexander R. Hammer

NEW YORK, April 4 (NYT)—Prices on the American Stock Exchange and in the over-the-counter market finished mixed last week in moderate trading.

Brokers attributed the indifferent trend to profit-taking and the absence of bullish economic news. A good portion of the activity on the Amex came from block transactions last week. This was said to reflect an upswing in last-minute switching by mutual funds in an attempt to improve the financial picture of their first-quarter balance sheets.

Consumers Credit-Shy
Moreover, consumers are still undertaking debt very cautiously. Installation credit rose by only $102 million in February, against $418 million a year earlier.

Consumers have continued to pour large amounts of money into savings. Large banks that report weekly in the Federal Reserve system disclosed a tremendous influx of savings in the week ended March 24—$850 million—and the nation's thrift institutions are experiencing an even larger inflow of funds.

The greater availability of money and the sharply reduced interest rates on mortgages (7 to 7 1/2 percent, compared with 8 1/2 percent only four months ago) has had a profound impact in spurring housing activity, especially on multifamily homes and existing houses.

But the aggressively easy-money policy being pursued by the Federal Reserve and the continued inflation in the United States have also had an adverse effect. They have led to a big (Continued on Page 13, Col. 5)

NBA Bucks Advance In Playoff Defeat Warriors; Bullets Gain

MADISON, Wis., April 4 (UPI).—The Milwaukee Bucks played nearly perfect basketball for three quarters and crushed the San Francisco Warriors, 136-86, today to win the National Basketball Association playoff series, four games to one.

The Bucks shot 59 percent from the field in the first half to take a 69-35 lead at the intermission.

At one point early in the fourth quarter, Milwaukee had built up a 20-point lead behind the outside shooting of John McGlocklin, who scored 16 of his game-high 28 points in the third quarter.

Bullets 128, 76ers 120. Baltimore scored 43 points in the second quarter today and went on to beat Philadelphia, 128-120, and advance to the NBA Eastern Division final.

The victory gave the Bullets the series, 4-3, and moved them into the play off against the New York Knicks, who have eliminated them the past two years.

Jack Marin led the Bullets with 33 points, four assists and 18 rebounds but it was Fred Carter and Earl Monroe who sparked the second-quarter rally.

The Cleveland Indians appear stronger, but the Senators appear mixed, with McLain only so-so and Flood showing how hard it is to come back after a year's layoff.

In the West, the Twins' two-year grip seems less secure. Rod Carew, who missed 110 games with an injured right arm, hit 300 this spring as did Tony Oliva and Harmon Killebrew.

In the National League's East, the Pittsburgh Pirates added Nelson Briles and Bob Johnson to their pitching staff, switched Al Oliver from first base to the outfield and Bob Robertson from the outfield to first base, and compiled the best exhibition record in Florida.

On Friday night, the Pacers were sparked by Bob Netolicky's 18 points in the third period and won the first game of their series, 114-98.

Stars 137, Chaparrals 107. Glenn Combs and Ron Boone combined for 49 points last night as they led Utah to a 137-107 victory over Texas in their Western Division semifinal playoff.

Colons 118, Floridians 112. Louis Dampier's ten-foot bank shot and Mike Pratt's two free throws lifted Kentucky over the Floridians, 118-112, in the opening game of their Eastern Division semifinal playoff series.

Utah limited Texas' high-scoring Donnie Freeman to eight points in the second half and defeated the Chaparrals, 125-115, in the first round of their Western Division semifinal playoffs.

Virginia 113, New York 106. Virginia 113, New York 106 (Barrett 22, C. Scott 20; Barry 23, Melchiorri 21).

Indiana 104, Memphis 104. Indiana 104, Memphis 104 (Daniels 21, Brown 20; St. Jones 23, W. Jones 18).

Chicago 88, Detroit 81. Chicago 88, Detroit 81 (Oswald 20, Miska 10; Howie 10, St. Louis 4; Pittsburgh 3; Bennett 2; Marcellino, Unger, McDermott, Fontenay, Appel).

Los Angeles 4, California 4. Los Angeles 4, California 4 (Fulford, Backstrom 2, Wilding, Curtis, Joyal, Stachhouse, Hazell, Williams, O'Donoghue). Kings came back from 3-0 deficit.

OVER A HURDLE—Some of the 38 horses in Saturday's Grand National Steeplechase at Aintree clear the infamous Becher's Brook fence. Only 12 horses finished the 30-obstacle, 4 1/2-mile extravaganza, which was won by 28-1 shot Specify.

Specify Jumps to Aintree Victory

LIVERPOOL, England, April 4 (AP).—Specify, a 28-1 shot, passed four horses over the last 50 yards today to win by a neck the 4 1/2-mile Grand National Steeplechase at Aintree.

Black Secret was second, two lengths ahead of third-place Astbury, in what was believed to be the closest finish in the race since it was inaugurated in 1837.

Alfa Romeo Halts Domination Of Porsche in Sports Car Race

BRANDS HATCH, England, April 4 (UPI).—Porsche's domination of this year's world Sports Car championship was broken here today by Alfa Romeo at the first round of the championship to be held in Europe.

The race was won by the Alfa of Andrea de Adamich of Italy and Henri Pescarolo of France, which completed the 235 laps in six hours 25 minutes 32.2 seconds at 97.17 mph.

Second was the works Ferrari of Belgian Jacky Ickx and Swiss Clay Regazzoni, who completed 232 laps of this 235-mile circuit with short straights, varying corners, and bumpy surfaces in 6:24:13.2 at 97.10 mph.

One lap behind the Porsche was a Ferrari driven by the Swiss pair of Herbert Mueller and Rene Herzig, at 94.13 mph.

Eight from the beginning, it was a battle between the five-liter Porsches, out to repeat its victories in the first round of the 1971 championship at Daytona Beach and Sebring, and the three-liter Alfa Romeos and the new three-liter Ferrari 312T of Ickx and Regazzoni.

ROCKENHEIM, Germany, April 4 (UPI).—Francois Cevert of France, driving a Tecno, sped to a 4.9 second victory over England's Graham Hill today in the Jim Clark Memorial race for Formula 1 cars at Rockenheim.

South American Carlos Reutemann of Argentina and Wilson Fittipaldi of Brazil took third and fourth, respectively, in the race, first of this year's 11 events on the European Formula 1 circuit.

A crowd of more than 100,000 turned out in spring-like weather.

Olivares Regains Bantam Title

INGLEWOOD, Calif., April 4 (UPI).—Ruben Olivares of Mexico, although knocked down in the sixth round, regained the world bantam-weight championship Friday night by pinning out a unanimous 15-round decision over countryman Chucho Castillo in their third title meeting.

Olivares, who lost the 118-pound crown to Castillo Oct. 16 on a 14-round knockout that resulted from eye cuts, displayed a superb left hook and superior boxing tactics this time to score his decisive victory.

Foreman, Terrell Win. LAKE GENEVA, Wis., April 4 (AP).—George Foreman and former champion Ernie Terrell had little trouble winning their heavyweight bouts at the Playboy Club hotel here last night.

Foreman, the world's third-ranked heavyweight, hit the roly-poly Terrell at will. He caught the 235-pound Jamaican with a solid right cross, sending Harris sprawling face first.

Russians Win Title In Hockey Defeat Sweden For 9th in Row

GENEVA, April 4 (UPI).—Russia scored four goals in the third period last night to beat Sweden, 6-3, and win the world ice hockey championship for the nine consecutive years.

The Czechs, who beat fourth-placed Finland, 4-2, earlier yesterday, would have won the title if Sweden had beaten the Russians, who began their winning streak in the 1963 tournament in Stockholm. Until 3:23 of the final period, the Swedes led the Russians, 3-2.

But Olen Valeri, on a pass from Vladimir Petrov, tied the score and the Swedes suddenly tired, allowing three more goals, by Boris Mikhailov, Petrov and defenseman Vladimir Lutchenko.

The Russians had opened the game by scoring within 28 seconds as Anatol Pirov hit the nets.

The Russians added another after 4:47 on a shot by Victor Kuzkin, and the crowd of 10,000, most of whom were rooting for a Swedish victory, thought it was all over.

But the Swedes, who have been accused by their own coach of playing "without heart" in the tournament, gave the Russians a fight as Haakan Pettersson, made it 2-1 after 7:22 and, after 4:48 of the second period, Toru Lundstrom got the equalizer.

In the six-team tournament, Russia won eight games, lost one—5-2 to Czechoslovakia—and tied the other game against the Czechs, 3-3, for 17 points.

The Czechs scored 15 points from seven victories, one tie and two defeats—to Sweden, 6-5, and the United States, 5-1.

The Czechs became European champions since their defeat against the United States did not count for the European competition.

After the tournament, the coach and all officials of the Swedish team tendered their resignations.

Helge Berglund, president of the Swedish Ice Hockey Association, said coach Arne Stromberg, team doctor Lasse Pettersson and other team officials resigned as a result of a split in the team.

It began with Stromberg openly criticizing his players for going to nightclubs rather than playing hockey. Stromberg made the charges after Sweden had suffered a shock 3-1 defeat to West Germany.

The players in return called a news conference and rejected the charges made by the coach.

Baltimore matched the 13-year-old invitational 100-yard dash record of 9.4 seconds yesterday in the Carolina State-Record relay.

Meriwether, a 27-year-old Charleston native and cancer-research scientist, finished strong after his usual slow start to match the record of Duke's Dave Sims, set in 1958.

Bill Holloway of East Tennessee won the University Division 100-yard dash in 9.5 to equal the meet mark set in 1967 by Maryland's James Lee.

Funseth Leads Greensboro

GREENSBORO, N.C., April 4 (AP).—Rod Funseth charged out of the pack with a six-mile race 65 and took sole control of the top spot in the third round of the $100,000 Greater Greensboro Open golf tournament yesterday.

Funseth had a 54-hole total of 204, nine-under-par on the 7,094-yard Seagrifee Country Club golf course.

That put him two strokes ahead of a group of three tied for second at 206—Miller Barber, rockie Brian Allan and Dave Eichelberger. Allan and Eichelberger each carried 67s while Barber had a 69 yesterday.

Bob Charles, the New Zealand left-hander who had a 68, and Pete Black, 70, were tied at 207. Lee Trevino had a 71 for 210, to trail by six strokes. U.S. Open champion Tony Jacklin of England took a 73 for 211. Billy Casper tumbled up for next week's defense of his Masters crown with a 67, but still was far back at 213. South African Gary Player, the defending champion here and winner of the last two tour events, had a 7 for 214.

THIRD-ROUND LEADERS: Rod Funseth 54-65-204; Miller Barber 67-70-206; Brian Allan 67-71-208; Pete Brown 68-70-207; Bob Charles 67-71-207; Jerry Hoyer 71-67-209; Terry Hill 70-67-209; Lee Trevino 71-68-210; Dave Stockton 71-70-210.

THE SCOREBOARD: GOLF—At Hong Kong, Texas Orville Moody won the Hong Kong Open as he shot a final round two-under-par 68 for a 70-hole aggregate of 286. Two strokes ahead of second place Kiruo Tsuruta of Japan. Third, with a 289 total, was Korean Eahn Chung Sang. At Buenos Aires, Nicolo Loeche of Argentina retained his World Boxing Association junior welterweight championship with a 15-round split decision over Domingo Barrera of Spain. Loeche, who had a four-round aggregate of 284, 60s, Italian Open title, also had a final-round 12 for his 285 total. CTCLING—At Antwerp, Belgium, with a kilometer to go, Evert Dolman of Holland sprinted away from a pack of 15 racers to win the 7.9 of Flanders pro road classic. Dolman covered the 363 kilometers in six hours, 15 minutes. The 14 other racers in the leading pack finished two seconds behind the winner, including Eusebio Barja, Jan Janssen, and Jan Krekel, freemason Jean Jorret, Orville Guimard and Yves Hazard, and Denmark's Ole Ritter. BASEBALL—At Rome, Ignis of Venezuela, the reigning European club champion, won his third consecutive Italian title by defeating simmenthal of Milan, 65-57.

Indians Candidates for Cellar in AL East

KUCSON, Ariz., April 4 (UPI).—The Cleveland Indians won 15 games with a bunch of kids and Sam McDowell in 1970 and finished 32 games behind the Baltimore Orioles.

They could win at least ten more games in 1971 and still finish in back in the pack in the tough American League East.

One of the toughest division contenders is the Philadelphia Phillies. Darky's Baltimore is Baltimore and there isn't much I can say about that, with Boston, though, did some good with winter trades. Detroit also improved by trades and the Yankees would be better than they were.

Darky leaves the Indians and Washington Senators in the East. Dark doesn't care to predict where his club will finish. "We were a very young and inexperienced club last year," Dark says, "so it's hard to say how good we'll be this year. The added experience will take care of our improvement."

Pitching, as Dark sees things, is the key to his club's success. He has two strong-armed and talented starters in McDowell, who won 20 and lost 12 last year along with a fine 2.92 earned-run average, and Steve Hargan, who came back from the minors last year and won 11 of 14 decisions while posting a 2.90 era.

Alan Foster and Ray Lamh, who came over from the Dodgers for catcher Duke Sims, apparently have the inside track for the other two starting berths.

Behind them as starting candidates are Rick Austin, who was 2-5 with the Indians last year; Rich Hand, who was 6-13; Phil Hennigan, 8-3, and Steve Dunning and Mark Ballinger.

Dunning moved from the Stanford campus to the Indians in mid-season last year and showed a lot of potential. He won only four of 13 decisions but displayed exceptional poise for a youngster.

The Scoreboard

ALPHA: SKYING—At Maribor, Austria, Polenta's Andrea Bacchetta led a 15-man team to a 1-0 victory in the 1971 International Prig tournament, shooting 69 two rounds, 136-69 for a total of 201.

Australia's World Cup holder, Anne-Marie, took a 67 in the first round of the 1971 Australian Open. In the second round, she shot a 73 to finish with a 140 total.

Pinson, Fosse and Foster represented the team's power last year and the addition of Harrelson should help, but all four would have to have outstanding seasons and the pitching must improve for the Indians to move up. It could be a tall order.

UNE DE MAI TRIUMPHS NAPLES, April 4.—French mare Une de Mai today captured the 1971 Agnans Grand Prix trotting race and a first prize of $68,000. Barbulu finished second and Murray Mir was third.
